RESPONSIBILITY OF OWNERS AND OPERATORS OF VEHICLES FOR HIRE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to require financial responsibility of owners and operators of vehicles for hire in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

FUNCTIONS OF FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION (S.DOC. NO. 11)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from J. C. Wright, Director of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution No. 351, Seventy-second Congress, a detailed report of all functions of the Board, including accounting, disbursing, collecting, purchasing, and personnel, and the annual cost thereof for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1932, which, with the accompanying statements, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Maine, favoring the restoration of the former 2-cent postal rate, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. HALE on the 3d instant, p. 1099, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Council of the City of San Buenaventura, Calif., favoring the issuance of national currency to municipalities on the pledge of their bonds, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from Louis J. Haennie, St. Louis, Mo., enclosing a memorandum report and other papers relative to a revival of the building industry, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Thirty-ninth Annual State Conference of the Rhode Island Daughters of the American Revolution, protesting against the recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, Calif., favoring the passage of legislation known as "the Lea bill", legalizing wine with an alcoholic content of from 10 to 12 percent, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a letter from S. R. Taylor, of the firm of Taylor & White, and a telegram from Arthur H. Carter, president of the New York State Society of Certified Public Accountants, both of New York City, N.Y., in reference to pending legislation regarding the regulation of securities sales, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

RETRENCHMENT IN FOREIGN COMMERCE SERVICE

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution adopted by the Philadelphia Board of Trade and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Extract from minutes of quarterly meeting, Philadelphia Board of Trade, held Mar. 20, 1933]

Your committee on foreign and coastwise commerce submits the following report:

"FOREIGN COMMERCE SERVICE

"Having been instructed by the executive council in previous sessions to study the opportunities for economy in the Foreign Commerce Services maintained by the United States Government, your committee would recommend to your favorable consideration that a protest be made to Congress against further retrenchment in appropriations for the Department of Commerce and the maintenance of its commercial attachés in foreign countries.

"That this be supplemented by recommendations to Congress that the Agricultural Department and certain other branches of the Federal Government be brought into more economically efficient coordination along the lines already adopted between the Department of Commerce and the Department of State.

"That the reduction of 47 percent in the Department of Commerce appropriations for the fiscal year ending July 1932, followed by a further 9 percent cut for the fiscal year ending July 1933, is evidence that there has been sufficient pruning in this particular branch of the Federal service, since American enterprise, seeking to reach markets abroad, is more dependent than ever before upon the assistance which the Commerce Department is able to accord in so marketing their merchandise.

"Despite the economies necessarily consequent upon this protracted depression in world commerce, which has so greatly curtailed the individual activities of American traders in foreign countries, it is noted that Great Britain is increasing their appropriations for the maintenance of their foreign commercial service, as are also Germany, Belgium, and Canada."

On motion the report of the committee was unanimously adopted and copy ordered forwarded to the proper executives at Washington.

True copy.

THE PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
PHILIP GODLEY, President.

Attest:
[SEAL] H. W. WILLS, Secretary.

PROSECUTION OF CERTAIN BANKING OFFICIALS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present and ask that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and appropriately referred a copy of a resolution adopted by the Swedish-American Republican League, of Worcester, Mass., which is similar to a number of resolutions I have received from other groups in Massachusetts.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas officials of the National City Bank of New York, one of our greatest financial institutions, have admitted to a congressional investigating committee that they have withheld from the investing public information which would have caused them to withhold purchasing their issue of Peruvian bonds; and

Whereas this institution and all institutions of a similar nature are created to protect the interests of the American investor who uses their services; and

Whereas confidence in our Government goes hand in hand with confidence in our banks, and inasmuch as government in general is influenced favorably or unfavorably by the character of the men or by their acts in the conduct of the affairs of our great financial institutions; and

Whereas the actions of the officials of said institution would seem to indicate that they have conspired to defraud the American people knowingly in order to secure unfair profit at the expense of the American public: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this organization place itself on record in favor of an immediate prosecution of all those who are guilty and to the full extent of the law, so that the Government of these United States may indicate to the American people that it will not tolerate such violations of trust either in the case of the officials of the above institutions or in the case of any other in the future.

AMERICAN BANKERS FAVOR PRESENT SYSTEM OF STATE AND NATIONAL BANKS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I am herewith sending to the desk, to be published in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, a brief article from the Washington Evening Star of last Saturday, containing an Associated Press dispatch to the effect that the economic policy commission of the American Bankers' Association at their last annual convention favored the present set-up of State and National banks, in preference to the centralized national system advocated by Governor Meyer, of the Federal Reserve Board.

This committee of the American Bankers' Association holds that the present dual system of State and National bank charters, which maintains local financial independence free from the domination of an overcentralized Federal arm, should be strengthened rather than destroyed.

I am free to say that the people of the 48 States, with their remaining 12,000 State banks saved from the wreck of the panic and depression which had its origin in a centralized stock-gambling orgy, will be glad to know, as the Members of this Chamber will be glad to know, that representative American bankers are not yet ready to surrender to a Wall Street oligarchy.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Evening Star, of Washington, D.C., Saturday, Apr. 1, 1933]

BANKERS OPPOSED TO UNIFIED SYSTEM—POLICY COMMISSION OF ASSOCIATION HAS DECLARED IN FAVOR OF PRESENT SET-UP

Creation of a unified banking system in this country is contrary to the views of the economic policy commission of the American Bankers' Association, voiced at the last annual convention of the association in Los Angeles last October.

At that time the commission declared that while it was in sympathy with the basic purposes envisioned in a unified plan it felt that the purposes could be attained under the present dual system of State and National charters.

It declared further that the present dual system has additional virtues in itself, particularly along the lines of maintaining local financial independence and credit sympathies free from the domination of overcentralized Federal Government, and that the dual system should be strengthened rather than destroyed.

On the other hand, Eugene Meyer, Jr., Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, believes we will never have a "satisfactory banking system in the United States until banks of deposit, commercial banks, can be gathered under one chartering, supervising, and regulatory power."

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD LEGAL OPINION FOR BANK CENTRALIZATION

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I am also sending to the desk to be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the full text of the legal opinion of the general counsel of the Federal Reserve Board on the powers of Congress to abolish State banks and make unlawful the receipt of deposits subject to withdrawal by check at any bank except one organized under Federal laws.

This opinion recites the statements of Governor Meyer, of the Federal Reserve System, at dates ranging from 1923 to 1932, to the effect that the failure of 10,000 banks during recent years is due to what he calls the present "heterogeneous banking structure" of State and National banks.

General Counsel Wyatt, of the Federal Reserve Board, thereupon gives it as his legal opinion that Congress has the power to abolish State banks by sundry prohibitions upon deposits, checks, and loans, and by imposition of prohibitive taxes and Federal penalties. This opinion is published in the Federal Reserve Bulletin of the current issue of March 30, 1933.

Not only every Member of Congress, but every State legislature, every State bankers association, every depositor in State banks, and every American citizen should have the opportunity to read this opinion and be apprised of the program of centralized banking power now formulated by those imbued with the ambition of controlling the financial resources of the 48 States.

Therefore I am asking general consent of the Senate to have this opinion published in full, that our constituents in 48 sovereign Commonwealths may know the details of the plan to destroy a large majority of their home banks.

In this connection I desire to say that many American citizens do not find the cause of recurring financial panics in the dual system of State and National banking, as held by Governor Meyer.

There are citizens who recall that the panic of 1929, the panics of 1907, 1893, and 1873 began in one place—the Wall Street Stock Exchange.

The panic spread to the States because of two centralized conditions: First, because Wall Street was the center of the banking reserves of the 48 States; second, because these reserves and the surplus savings of the people of 48 States were used in stock-gambling operations instead of in the lawful business of industry and commerce.

In other words, the central cause of our national panics resides in the fact that already there is too great centralization of the national resources. That centralization is already destroying the financial independence of the States and towns to the extent that a school teacher in a village 2,000 miles away, a farmer in any of the 48 States, may not be able to cash a check against their home savings because there is a panic in Wall Street.

I hope that Congress will never pass a law to further increase this overcentralized banking power pursuant to the opinion of the general counsel of the Federal Reserve Board. But this much our constituents are entitled to know, and that is, to know in detail the plans of our financial oligarchy against the banking democracy and financial freedom of the States and our home institutions.

Every State banker and depositor should have the truth and the whole truth, so far as the Senate is able to furnish it.

That there may be no question with regard to the aim of this Federal Reserve Board legal opinion, I am going to quote two short sentences therefrom. The first sentence is on page 2 of the opinion, as follows (p. 167 of the March Federal Reserve Bulletin):

> If it deems it necessary to prevent banks organized under State laws from engaging in the commercial banking business in order to accomplish this object, Congress may lawfully do so.

The second sentence is on the last page of the legal opinion (p. 186 of the Bulletin), in the list of legal findings of congressional power:

> (1) It could forbid the receipt of deposits subject to withdrawal by check by any individual, partnership, or corporation other than a bank organized under the laws of the United States and provide suitable penalties for violations of this provision.

There are in all 22 pages reciting in sundry forms the general thesis above indicated. The findings embraced on the final page include six classes of prohibitory provisions, covering deposits, loans, checks, collections, credits, commercial facilities, and confiscatory taxes and penalties for Federal enforcement. It has more teeth against State banking than apparently the eighteenth amendment against the liquor traffic.

The country will be glad to read the new prohibition act proposed by Wall Street.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LEGISLATION PROVIDING A UNIFIED COMMERCIAL BANKING SYSTEM FOR THE UNITED STATES

The Federal Reserve Board, at the time of the appearance of the Governor of the Board on March 29, 1932, before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency in connection with the Glass bill (S. 4115), which was then under consideration by the committee, was requested to suggest a constitutional method of creating a unified banking system in the United States. In accord with this request, the general counsel of the Federal Reserve Board prepared an opinion, which was transmitted to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. The text of the opinion is published below:

To the Federal Reserve Board:

Senate Resolution 71, adopted on May 5, 1930, directed the Committee on Banking and Currency to conduct an investigation and recommend legislation "to provide for a more effective operation of the national and Federal Reserve Banking Systems of the country." Following extensive hearings by a subcommittee of which he was chairman, Senator GLASS introduced Senate bill 4115, Seventy-second Congress. At a hearing on the bill before the Committee on Banking and Currency on March 29, 1932, Governor Meyer presented a letter expressing the unanimous views of the members of the Federal Reserve Board, which contained the following statement:

"It should be recognized that effective supervision of banking in this country has been seriously hampered by the competition betweeen member and nonmember banks, and that the establishment of a unified system of banking under national supervision is essential to fundamental banking reform."

Bankers had testified that certain provisions of the bill would make it difficult for member banks to compete with nonmember banks and would cause defections from the Federal Reserve System and the national banking system; and during his testimony Governor Meyer called attention to the statement quoted above and stressed the fact that "effective supervision of banking in this country has been seriously affected by competition between member and nonmember banks", and that "competition between the State and national banking systems has resulted in weakening both steadily." Thereupon Senator GLASS requested Governor Meyer to "suggest to us a constitutional method of creating a unified banking system in this country."

In view of the circumstances under which this request was made, the history of our banking system, and the provisions of Senate Resolution No. 71, it appears that, by "creating a unified banking system", is meant bringing all commercial banking business in the United States into a single banking system subject to effective regulation and supervision by the Federal Government.

Congress has already created the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System; and the problem is how to achieve uniformity of corporate powers, regulation, and supervision with respect to banks engaged in the commercial banking business and to provide for their safe and effective operation, by eliminating the existing competition between the Federal Government and the 48 States for the privilege of granting charters to banks transacting that type of business.

Since commercial banking necessarily involves the receipt of deposits subject to withdrawal by check, Congress can achieve that result if it can enact legislation which will have the effect of confining the business of receiving deposits subject to withdrawal by check to national banks, which have uniform powers under the National Bank Act, are subject to effective regulation and supervision by the Federal Government, and are required to be members of the Federal Reserve System.

The question presented, therefore, is whether, in order to provide for a more effective operation of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, Congress has the power under the Constitution to restrict the business of receiving deposits subject to withdrawal by check to national banks.

A consideration of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States leaves no room for doubt that this question must be answered in the affirmative. While numerous authorities supporting this conclusion are cited and discussed below, the principal reasons may be stated concisely as follows:

1. The power to create the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System as useful instrumentalities to aid the Federal Government in the performance of certain important governmental functions includes the power to take such action as Congress may deem necessary to preserve the existence and promote the efficiency of those systems. (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316; Farmers and Mechanics National Bank v. Dearing, 91 U.S. 29; Westfall v. United States, 274 U.S. 256.)

2. Having provided the country with a national currency through the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, Congress may constitutionally preserve the full benefits of such currency for the people by appropriate legislation. (Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533; Legal Tender cases, 12 Wall. 457.)

3. The existence of a heterogeneous banking structure in which there have been more than 10,000 bank failures during the past 12 years constitutes a burden upon and an obstruction to interstate commerce, and Congress may enact appropriate legislation to correct this condition. (United States v. Ferger, 250 U.S. 195; Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495; Board of Trade v. Olsen, 262 U.S. 1.)

Any one of these grounds standing alone would be a sufficient constitutional justification for the enactment of legislation restricting the conduct of the commercial banking business to national banks; and, when all three grounds are considered together, there can be no doubt that such legislation would be not only constitutional but also entirely appropriate and in accordance with a proper division of authority between the Federal Government and the States.

Having the power to confine the commercial banking business to national banks, Congress can exercise that power in any manner which it deems appropriate and adequate for its purposes. It is not necessary that the legislation assume the form of a revenue act or an act to regulate interstate commerce, though either of these means would be appropriate.

I. THE POWER TO CREATE AND MAINTAIN A BANKING SYSTEM

Ample authority for the first conclusion stated above is contained in the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland (1819) (4 Wheat. 316, 4 L.ed. 579), wherein the Supreme Court of the United States established the following principles:

(1) Congress has the power to create banks as convenient, appropriate, and useful instrumentalities to aid the Federal Government in the performance of its functions.

(2) This power is derived from a group of great powers, including the powers to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to declare and conduct wars, to raise and support armies and navies, and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

(3) If the end be legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may constitutionally be employed to carry it into effect.

(4) If a certain means to carry into effect any of the powers, expressly given by the Constitution to the Government of the Union, be an appropriate measure, not prohibited by the Constitution, the degree of its necessity is a question of legislative discretion, not of judicial cognizance.

(5) The States have no power by taxation or otherwise to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operation of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the Federal Government.

(6) The Constitution and laws of the United States are the supreme laws of the land; and "it is of the very essence of supremacy to remove all obstacles to its action within its own sphere."

Applying these principles, Congress has created the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, which are now recognized as appropriate, if not indispensable, agencies to assist the Government in the performance of certain essential governmental functions. The States have no legal power to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operation of these agencies; and Congress clearly has the right to enact such legislation as it may deem necessary to "remove all obstacles" to their safe and effective operation. If it deems it necessary to prevent banks organized under State laws from engaging in the commercial banking business in order to accomplish this object, Congress may lawfully do so.

Since the decision of the Supreme Court in McCulloch v. Maryland is the legal foundation stone upon which our national banking system, our Federal Reserve System, and our Federal Farm Loan System have been built and their constitutionality sustained, that case should be considered in more detail. The essential facts giving rise to the decision were as follows:

The Bank of the United States was granted a special charter by the act of Congress approved April 10, 1816, and was authorized to establish branches throughout the United States. It established its head office in Philadelphia and a branch in Baltimore, Md. The Legislature of the State of Maryland enacted a statute taxing all banks or branches thereof in the State which were not chartered by the State and prescribing a penalty to be collected from the officers of any bank that failed to pay the tax. The Bank of the United States did not pay this tax on the transactions of its Baltimore branch, and a suit was brought against McCulloch, the cashier of the branch, to recover the penalty.

McCulloch defended on the ground that the State law was unconstitutional and void because it was in conflict with a valid Federal statute. The State contended that the act of Congress chartering the Bank of the United States was unconstitutional and that, therefore, the State statute was valid. By a unanimous opinion the Supreme Court of the United States held that the act of Congress chartering the Bank of the United States was valid and that the State law purporting to tax the bank was invalid.

The following quotations from the masterful opinion rendered by Chief Justice Marshall will illustrate the profound reasoning upon which the Court's decision was based (4 Wheat. 407, 411, 415, 421, 422, 424):

"Although, among the enumerated powers of government, we do not find the word 'bank' or 'incorporation', we find the great powers to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to declare and conduct a war, and to raise and support armies and navies. The sword and the purse, all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the nation, are intrusted to its government. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance, merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may with great reason be contended that a government, intrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation so vitally depends, must also be intrusted with ample means for their execution.

* * * * * * *

"But the Constitution of the United States has not left the right of Congress to employ the necessary means for the execution of the powers conferred on the Government to general reasoning. To its enumeration of powers is added that of making 'all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution, in the Government of the United States, or in any department thereof.'

* * * * * * *

"To have prescribed the means by which government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change entirely the character of the instrument and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide by immutable rules for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur. To have declared that the best means shall not be used, but those alone without which the power given would be nugatory, would have been to deprive the legislature of the capacity to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances.

* * * * * * *

"We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

* * * * * * *

"If a corporation may be employed indiscriminately with other means to carry into execution the powers of the Government, no particular reason can be assigned for excluding the use of a bank, if required for its fiscal operations. To use one must be within the discretion of Congress, if it be an appropriate mode of executing the powers of government. That it is a convenient, a useful, and essential instrument in the prosecution of its fiscal operations, is not now a subject of controversy.

* * * * * * *

"After this declaration it can scarcely be necessary to say that the existence of State banks can have no possible influence on the question. No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the Government of the Union on those of the States, for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adequate to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends. To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it cannot control, which another government may furnish or withhold, would render its course precarious, the result of its measures uncertain, and create a dependence on other governments, which might disappoint its most important designs, and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution. But were it otherwise the choice of means implies a right to choose a national bank in preference to State banks, and Congress alone can make the election." (Italics supplied.)

Having announced that it was "the unanimous and decided opinion" of the Court that the act to incorporate the Bank of the United States was a law made in pursuance of the Constitution, and was a part of the supreme law of the land, the Chief Justice proceeded to consider the question whether the State could tax the bank (4 Wheat. 426, 427, 436):

"This great principle is, that the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme; that they control the Constitution and laws of the respective States, and cannot be controlled by them. From this, which may be almost termed an axiom, other propositions are deduced as corollaries, on the truth or error of which, and on their application to this case, the cause has been supposed to depend. These are, 1. That a power to create implies a power to preserve. 2. That a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to, and incompatible with these powers to create and to preserve. 3. That where this repugnancy exists, that authority which is supreme must control, not yield to that over which it is supreme.

* * * * * * *

"* * * It is of the very essence of supremacy to remove all obstacles to its action within its own sphere, and so to modify every power vested in subordinate governments as to exempt its own operations from their own influence. This effect need not be stated in terms. It is so involved in the declaration of supremacy, so necessarily implied in it, that the expression of it could not make it more certain. We must, therefore, keep it in view while construing the Constitution.

* * * * * * *

"The Court has bestowed on this subject its most deliberate consideration. The result is a conviction that the States have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government. This is, we think, the unavoidable consequence of that supremacy which the Constitution has declared." (Italics supplied.)

In the case of Osborn v. United States Bank (1824) (9 Wheat. 738; 6 L.ed. 204), substantially the same questions as had been considered by the Supreme Court in McCulloch v. Maryland were presented in substantially the same form. Yielding to the request of counsel, the whole subject was re-examined and the principles announced in McCulloch v. Maryland were restated and upheld.

Considering more fully the question of the possession by the bank of private powers associated with its public authority and meeting the contention that the two were separable and that the public power should be treated as within, and the private power as without, the implied power of Congress, the Supreme Court expressly held that the authority of Congress was to be ascertained by considering the bank as an entity, possessing the rights and powers conferred upon it, and that the lawful power to create the bank and give it the attributes which were deemed essential should not be rendered unavailing by detaching particular powers and considering them alone and thus destroying the efficacy of the bank as a national instrument.

The ruling of the court, therefore, was to the effect that, although a particular character of business might not, when considered alone, be within the implied power of Congress, yet, if such business was appropriate or relevant to the banking business, the implied power was to be tested by the right to create a bank and the authority to attach to it that which was relevant in the judgment of Congress to make the business of the bank successful.

In rendering the opinion of the Court, Chief Justice Marshall said (9 Wheat. 860–863):

"* * * That the mere business of banking is, in its own nature, a private business, and may be carried on by individuals or companies having no political connection with the Government, is admitted; but the bank is not such an individual or company. It was not created for its own sake or for private purposes. It has never been supposed that Congress could create such a corporation. The whole opinion of the Court, in the case of McCulloch v. The

State of Maryland, is founded on, and sustained by, the idea that the bank is an instrument which is 'necessary and proper for carrying into effect the powers vested in the Government of the United States.'

* * * * * * *

"* * * Can this instrument, on any rational calculation, effect its object unless it be endowed with that faculty of lending and dealing in money which is conferred by its charter? * * * The distinction between destroying what is denominated the corporate franchise and destroying its vivifying principle is precisely as incapable of being maintained as a distinction between the right to sentence a human being to death and a right to sentence him to a total privation of sustenance during life. Deprive a bank of its trade and business, which is its sustenance, and its immortality, if it have that property, will be a very useless attribute. This distinction, then, has no real existence. To tax its faculties, its trade, and occupation is to tax the bank itself. To destroy or preserve the one it to destroy or preserve the other.

* * * * * * *

"* * * The operations of the bank are believed not only to yield the compensation for its services to the Government but to be essential to the performance of those services. Those operations give its value to the currency in which all the transactions of the Government are conducted. They are, therefore, inseparably connected with those transactions. They enable the bank to render those services to the Nation for which it was created and are, therefore, of the very essence of its character as national instruments * * *." (Italics supplied.)

The charter of the Bank of the United States, having expired in 1836, the country was left to depend for its currency on a multitude of State banks which sprang up under numerous different State laws, most of which contained either no provisions or inadequate provisions regarding capital, reserves, and supervision.

Having experienced the difficulty of conducting the War of 1812 without the aid of a Federal banking system, however, Congress during the Civil War enacted the National Bank Act on February 25, 1863, and revised it on June 3, 1864. This time it did not undertake to create a single bank with branches throughout the Union, but provided for the creation of numerous local banks, each independent of the other, but all operating under a single banking law and under the supervision of the Treasury Department of the United States Government.

In the case of Farmers & Mechanics National Bank v. Dearing (1875) (91 U.S. 29; 23 L.ed. 197) the Supreme Court applied the doctrines of its earlier decisions to national banks organized under the National Bank Act of 1864. The case involved the question whether State usury laws were applicable to national banks, and in holding that they were not the Court said (p. 33):

"The constitutionality of the act of 1864 is not questioned. It rests on the same principle as the act creating the second bank of the United States. The reasoning of Secretary Hamilton and of this Court in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316) and in Osborn v. Bank (9 Wheat. 738) therefore applies. The national banks organized under the act are instruments designed to be used to aid the Government in the administration of an important branch of the public service. They are means appropriate to that end. Of the degree of the necessity which existed for creating them, Congress is the sole judge.

"Being such means, brought into existence for this purpose, and intended to be so employed, the States can exercise no control over them, nor in any wise affect their operation except insofar as Congress may see proper to permit. Anything beyond this is 'an abuse, because it is the usurpation of power which a single State cannot give.' Against the national will 'the States have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burthen, or in any manner control the operation of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the General Government.' (Osborn v. Bank, supra; Weston and Others v. Charleston, 2 Pet. 466; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419; Dobbins v. Erie County, 16 Pet. 435.)

"The power to create carries with it the power to preserve. The latter is a corollary from the former." (Italics supplied.)

In Davis v. Elmira Savings Bank (1896) (161 U.S. 275; 16 Sup. Ct. 502) the same question arose in another form. The Legislature of the State of New York provided by law that a savings bank organized under the laws of that State should have a preference as a depositor in other banks in case of the insolvency of the latter, and it was sought to apply this provision to the case of a deposit by a savings bank in a national bank which had subsequently become insolvent. The Supreme Court of the United States held that such a provision of a State law could not apply to national banks, because it was in conflict with that provision of the National Bank Act which requires the assets of an insolvent national bank to be distributed ratably among its creditors. In so holding the Court said (p. 503):

"National banks are instrumentalities of the Federal Government created for a public purpose, and as such necessarily subject to the paramount authority of the United States. It follows that an attempt by a State to define their duties or control the conduct of their affairs is absolutely void, wherever such attempted exercise of authority expressly conflicts with the laws of the United States, and either frustrates the purpose of the national legislation or impairs the efficiency of these agencies of the Federal Government to discharge the duties for the performance of which they were created. These principles are axiomatic and are sanctioned by the repeated adjudications of this Court." (Italics supplied.)

In Easton v. Iowa (1903) (188 U.S. 220; 23 Sup. Ct. 288), Easton the president of a national bank, was convicted in the State court under a State law making it a crime to receive deposits while the bank was insolvent. On appeal the Supreme Court of the United States held that the State law had no application to a national bank. In so holding the Court said (pp. 290, 293):

"* * * the Federal legislation creating and regulating national banks * * * has in view the erection of a system extending throughout the country, and independent, so far as powers conferred are concerned, of State legislation which, if permitted to be applicable, might impose limitations and restrictions as various and as numerous as the States. Having due regard to the national character and purposes of that system, we cannot concur in the suggestions that national banks, in respect to the powers conferred upon them, are to be viewed as solely organized and operated for private gain. The principles enunciated in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 425) and in Osborn v. United States Bank (9 Wheat. 738), though expressed in respect to banks incorporated directly by acts of Congress, are yet applicable to the later and present system of national banks.

"Our conclusions, upon principle and authority, are that Congress, having power to create a system of national banks, is the judge as to the extent of the powers which should be conferred upon such banks, and has the sole power to regulate and control the exercise of their operations; * * * that it is not competent for State legislatures to interfere, whether with hostile or friendly intentions, with national banks or their officers in the exercise of the powers bestowed upon them by the General Government." (Italics supplied.)

Having been denied the right to impose limitations and restrictions upon national banks, the States have granted increasingly liberal powers to competing State banks and, in many instances, have subjected them to fewer restrictions and less effective regulation and supervision. This has led Congress to modify the safeguards contained in the original National Bank Act in order to enable national banks to compete with State banks and thus to preserve the existence of the national banking system. Such competition between the Federal Government and the various States has led to more and more laxity in bank regulation and supervision.

Moreover, when Congress has undertaken to enact legislation designed to "provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of national banking associations", it has been told that the proposed legislation would make it difficult for national banks to compete with State banks and would cause national banks to reorganize as State banks.

Since "it is not competent for State legislatures to interfere * * * with national banks or their officers in the exercise of the powers bestowed upon them by the General Government", they cannot do so indirectly by granting State banks competitive advantages; and if the competition of State banks interferes with the safe and effective operation of national banks, Congress can put an end to such interference with the national purpose by preventing State banks from competing with national banks for commercial banking business.

First National Bank v. Union Trust Co. (1917) (244 U.S. 416; 37 Sup. Ct. 734) turned upon the constitutionality of section 11 (k) of the Federal Reserve Act, which granted to national banks the right to act, in certain circumstances, as trustees, executors, and administrators. It was contended that, unlike the business of banking, there was no natural connection or relationship between acting in these capacities and carrying on the fiscal operations of the Federal Government, and that, moreover, the legislation constituted a direct invasion of the sovereignty of the States, which control not only the devolution of the estates of deceased persons and the conduct of private business within the States but as well the creation of corporations and the qualifications and duties of such as may engage in the business of acting as trustees, executors, and administrators. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, took cognizance of the fact that Congress had authorized national banks to act in these capacities in order to enable them to compete with State corporations which were authorized to transact such business in connection with their banking business, and therefore the Court sustained the constitutionality of the law.

In rendering the opinion of the Court on this question Chief Justice White reviewed the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court in the cases of McCulloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. Bank, and said (p. 737):

"* * * What those cases established was that although a business was of a private nature and subject to State regulation, if it was of such a character as to cause it to be incidental to the successful discharge by a bank chartered by Congress of its public functions, it was competent for Congress to give the bank the power to exercise such private business in cooperation with or as part of its public authority. Manifestly this excluded the power to the State in such case, although it might possess in a general sense authority to regulate such business, to use that authority to prohibit such business from being united by Congress with the banking function, since to do so would be but the exertion of State authority to prohibit Congress from exerting a power which, under the Constitution, it had a right to exercise. From this it must also follow that even although a business be of such a character that it is not inherently considered susceptible of being included by Congress in the powers conferred on national banks, that rule would cease to apply if, by State law, State banking corporations, trust companies, or others which, by reason of their business, are rivals or quasi-rivals of national banks, are permitted to carry on such business. This must be, since the State may not by legislation create a condition as to a particular business which would bring about actual or potential competition with the business of national banks, and at the same time deny the power of Congress to meet such created condition by legislation appropriate to avoid the injury which otherwise would be suffered by the national agency." (Italics supplied.)

Likewise, the States may not, by granting increasingly liberal powers to State banks and trust companies, create a competitive situation that makes it impossible for Congress to preserve the existence of the national banking system without removing the safeguards necessary to make it a safe and effective system and at the same time deny the right of Congress to meet the situation by putting an end to such competition.

In the case of State of Missouri v. Duncan (1924) (265 U.S. 17, 44 Sup. Ct. 427) the Burnes National Bank, of St. Joseph, Mo., being duly authorized to act as executor by a permit issued by the Federal Reserve Board under the provisions of section 11 (k) of the Federal Reserve Act, was named as executor by a citizen of Missouri who died leaving a will. The bank applied to the probate court for letters testamentary but was denied appointment on the ground that national banks were not permitted to act as executors under the laws of Missouri. Thereupon, the national bank applied to the supreme court of the State for a writ of mandamus to require the judge of the probate court to issue letters testamentary. The Supreme Court of Missouri denied a writ of mandamus and an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, which reversed the opinion of the State court and held that the probate court had no right to deny the national bank letters testamentary.

After quoting the second paragraph of section 11 (k) of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended by the act of September 26, 1918 (40 Stat. 967), the Supreme Court said, through Mr. Justice Holmes (pp. 23, 24):

"* * * This says in a roundabout and polite but unmistakable way that whatever may be the State law, national banks having the permit of the Federal Reserve Board may act as executors if trust companies competing with them have that power. The relator has the permit, competing trust companies can act as executors in Missouri, the importance of the powers to the sustaining of competition in the banking business is so well known and has been explained so fully heretofore that it does not need to be emphasized, and thus the naked question presented is whether Congress had the power to do what it tried to do.

* * * * * * *

"The States cannot use their most characteristic powers to reach unconstitutional results. (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas, 216 U.S. 1; Pullman Co. v. Kansas, 216 U.S. 56; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Foster, 247 U.S. 105, 114.) There is nothing over which a State has more exclusive authority than the jurisdiction of its courts, but it cannot escape its constitutional obligations by the device of denying jurisdiction to courts otherwise competent (Kenney v. Supreme Lodge of the World, 252 U.S. 411, 415). So here—the State cannot lay hold of its general control of administration to deprive national banks of their power to compete that Congress is authorized to sustain." (Italics supplied.)

Nor would it seem that the States, through the exercise of their power to charter banks, can maintain a situation which impairs the efficiency of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System. The power to create these systems includes the power to preserve them; and Congress can eliminate the ruinous competition that now exists between the national banking system and the 48 State banking systems if it finds it necessary to do as a means of preserving the efficacy of its own instrumentalities.

In Westfall v. United States (1927) (247 U.S. 256; 47 Sup. Ct. 629) the defendant, who was not even an official of any member bank of the Federal Reserve System, was indicted for aiding and procuring a branch manager of a State bank which was a member of the Federal Reserve System to misapply the funds of the bank in violation of a provision of section 9 of the Federal Reserve Act. He attacked the constitutionality of the statute on the ground that Congress had no power to punish offenses against the property rights of State banks and that the statute is so broad that it covers such offenses when they would not result in any loss to the Federal Reserve bank. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, held that the statute was constitutional and said (p. 258):

"* * * And if a State bank chooses to come into the System created by the United States, the United States may punish acts injurious to the System, although done to a corporation that the State also is entitled to protect. The general proposition is too plain to need more than statement. That there is such a System and that the reserve banks are interested in the solvency and financial condition of the members also is too obvious to require a repetition of the careful analysis presented by the Solicitor General. The only suggestion that may deserve a word is that the statute applies indifferently whether there is a loss to the reserve banks or not. But every fraud like the one before us weakens the member bank and therefore weakens the System. Moreover, when it is necessary in order to prevent an evil to make the law embrace more than the precise thing to be prevented, it may do so. It may punish the forgery and utterance of spurious interstate bills of lading in order to protect the genuine commerce. (United States v. Ferger, 250 U.S. 199.) See further Southern R. Co. v. United States (222 U.S. 20, 26). That principle is settled. Finally Congress may employ State corporations with their consent as instrumentalities of the United States (Clallam County v. United States, 263 U.S. 321), and may make frauds that impair their efficiency crimes." (United States v. Walter, 263 U.S. 15.) (Italics supplied.)

If Congress can go to that length in order to protect the Federal Reserve System from a relatively minor danger, it can relieve the member banks of that System of the competition of nonmember banks for commercial banking business in order to protect the Federal Reserve System from the greater danger of having the efficiency and safety of its operations impaired by such competition. If, in order to accomplish this object, it deems it appropriate to restrict the transaction of a commercial banking business to national banks, which are required to be members of the Federal Reserve System, Congress clearly has the right to do so.

A brief review of the history of Federal banking legislation will disclose that Congress already has made two attempts to create a unified banking system for the United States and that, in the language of Mr. Justice Holmes in State of Missouri v. Duncan, "The naked question presented is whether Congress has the power to do what it tried to do."

When it enacted the National Bank Act Congress recognized that banking is a matter of national public interest and attempted to create a unified banking system under Federal supervision. As will be shown in more detail hereinafter, the act of March 3, 1865, which imposed a prohibitive tax on the circulating notes of State banks, was intended not only to provide a uniform currency but also to compel State banks to convert into national banks. It succeeded in eliminating State-bank currency and almost succeeded in eliminating State banks; but the State banks overcame the handicap of not being able to issue currency and multiplied in number until by 1910 their number was almost twice that of national banks.

By the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act of December 23, 1913, Congress made another attempt to create a unified banking system, by requiring all national banks in the continental United States to become members of the Federal Reserve System and inviting State banks to do so voluntarily. This object was recognized by the Federal Reserve Board in a circular issued on June 7, 1915, and published in the Federal Reserve Bulletin for July 1915, at page 145, wherein the Board said:

"A unified banking system, embracing in its membership the well-managed banks of the country, small and large, State and national, is the aim of the Federal Reserve Act. There can be but one American credit system of Nation-wide extent, and it will fall short of satisfying the business judgment and expectation of the country and fail of attaining its full potentialities if it rests upon an incomplete foundation and leaves out of its membership any considerable part of the banking strength of the country."

When we entered the Great War, however, only 53 State banks, with resources aggregating $750,000,000, had become members of the Federal Reserve System; and, in order to induce additional State banks to become members, so that the financial resources of the Nation might be mobilized for the great struggle then confronting it, Congress made a number of concessions which materially diminished its own control over State member banks of the Federal Reserve System.

By the act of June 21, 1917 (40 Stat. 232), it eliminated the requirements of the original Federal Reserve Act that State member banks must comply with the loan limitations of the National Bank Act and must be examined at least twice a year by the Comptroller of the Currency and provided that, subject to the provisions of the Federal Reserve Act and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made pursuant thereto, such banks should retain their full charter and statutory rights as State banks or trust companies and might continue to exercise all corporate powers granted by the States in which they were created.

On October 13, 1917, the President of the United States appealed to the State banks and trust companies to become members of the Federal Reserve System for patriotic purposes, saying that "The extent to which our country can withstand the financial strains for which we must be prepared will depend very largely upon the strength and staying power of the Federal Reserve banks." (Ann. Rept. F.R. Board, 1917, p. 9.)

Notwithstanding these concessions by Congress and this appeal of President Wilson, however, there were only 936 State member banks with resources aggregating $7,338,813,000 in the Federal Reserve System on January 1, 1919. Only 11 percent of the State banks had become members of the Federal Reserve System, and these banks held only 54.5 percent of the resources of all State banks and trust companies in the country. (Ann. Rep. F.R. Board, 1918, pp. 26–27.)

Moreover, at the peak of State-bank membership, which occurred on June 30, 1922, there were only 1,648 State banks and trust companies which were members of the Federal Reserve System out of a total of approximately 20,000 State banks and trust companies in the country; and the member State banks and trust companies held only 51 percent of the total resources of all State banks and trust companies. (Ann. Rep. Fed. Res. Board, 1922, p. 29; Ann. Rep. Comp. Cur., 1931, pp. 3, 5.) And on June 30, 1932, there were only 835 State member banks and trust companies in the Federal Reserve System.

Furthermore, the amendments of June 21, 1917, which were enacted in order to induce State banks to become members of the Federal Reserve System voluntarily, had greatly weakened the control of the Federal Government over State member banks; the successive amendments to the National Bank Act, which were intended to enable national banks to compete more effectively with State banks, had materially lowered the standard previously set by the National Bank Act; the "better supervision of banking, which is one of the major purposes of the Federal Reserve Act, had been seriously impeded; and the 10 years 1921 to 1931 witnessed numerous failures of State member banks and a larger number of failures of national banks than had occurred previously in the entire history of the national banking system from 1863 to 1921.

Mr. Eugene Meyer, then managing director of the War Finance Corporation, made the following statement on January 31, 1923, in testifying before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives (hearings on S. 4280, 67th Cong., pt. I, p. 56):

"There are necessarily many difficulties involved in our dual system of banking. We have a State banking system, a national banking system, and a Federal Reserve System, the latter having a membership derived from both the State and the national systems. The State banking departments supervise the State banks and the Comptroller of the Currency supervises the national banks, while the Federal Reserve System has a supervision of its own for the member banks, and there has been at times some disposition to competition between the State and the national banking systems.

"The State banking laws frequently permit practices which national banks cannot legally engage in. This is creating competition between the two systems which cannot be regarded as wholesome and may lead to the gradual weakening of both. * * * The competition that exists at the present time between State and national banks cannot fail to remind one of the competition that prevailed a generation ago among the various States seeking to become domiciles for corporations—a competition that was based upon the laxity of the laws governing incorporation. Nothing could be more disastrous than competition between the State and national banking groups, based upon competition in laxity." (Italics supplied.)

In testifying before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives on April 27 and 28, 1932, in his capacity as governor of the Federal Reserve Board and chairman of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and in the light of his experience as managing director of the War Finance Corporation, Mr. Eugene Meyer discussed this subject again. (Hearings re payment of adjusted-service certificates, 72d Cong., 1st sess., pp. 631, 642, 643.) His testimony was, in part, as follows:

"Personally I feel, as I stated to a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee the other day, that we will never have a satisfactory banking system in the United States until banks of deposit, commercial banks, can be gathered under one chartering, supervising, and regulatory power. The constant competition between State and national banking systems has resulted in a weakening of the laws and the safeguards of both systems, which, I think, contributed in no small degree to the excesses of the inflation period and to the suffering of the deflation period. The minds of the committees charged with banking and currency responsibilities are engaged in studying this problem.

"I am entirely in favor of maintaining State rights to the extent that they can properly be maintained. But there are various functions over which the Federal Government has had to assume jurisdiction. We have the Postal Service, and have had it since the beginning of the Government. As other activities become national and interstate on a greater scale, I feel that we must take account of these changed conditions. We must have elasticity in our conception of decentralization and the advantage of local control when there are vital changes in financial and economic conditions."

This subject was also discussed by Mr. Owen D. Young, deputy chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, in his testimony before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on February 4, 1931. (Hearings pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 71 of the 71st Cong., pp. 353 et seq.) He said:

"I want to say, first, Mr. Chairman, * * * that all commercial deposit banking in the United States should be carried on under one law, that examinations of banks and their control should be under one authority. Their reserves should be mobilized in the Federal Reserve System. Then we could develop for the country as a whole a sound banking system and definitely fix responsibility. That would mean that all banks of deposit, as distinguished from savings, should be national banks.

"As it is now, banks are chartered both by the National Government and by each of the 48 States. They are in competition, each endeavoring to offer the most attractive charters and the most liberal laws, to say nothing of the liberality of administrative officials in interpreting the laws. The National Banking Act has to compete not only with the most conservative States but the most liberal ones. Consequently there has been a constant tendency to liberalize banking laws and to weaken their administration. In such cases the argument is always made that it is desirable to liberalize the law so as to enable the banks to be of great service to borrowers.

"The first question always regarding banks doing a demand-deposit business should be the safety of the deposits and the ability of the bank to return them to depositors instantly on request, unless they be time deposits. No thought of service to borrowers should be permitted to impair the safety and security of deposits. Banks of deposit are, after all, primarily custodians of liquid funds. Only such use of such funds should be permitted as may be consistent with the interests of the depositors.

"In the early years of our Government our business was largely done by currency moving from hand to hand. It was felt at that time, and properly so, that we should have a national and uniform currency. Consequently Congress was given power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. This power was made effective as to paper money by the National Bank Act. Now our business is carried on mostly by transfers of bank deposits, currency forming only a small part of our money transfers. If control of our currency were necessary in the beginning by the Federal Government, control of our bank deposits by it now would seem desirable. We have transferred, either affirmatively or by acquiescence, many powers to the Federal Government which ought not to be there. I am bitterly opposed to the impairment of the rights to the States in their appropriate field. It does seem strange, however, that in the face of such gravitation toward Federal authority we should have retained divided rather than unified power over our deposit banking system.

"Except for the currency in our pockets, our banks of deposit hold the liquid capital of the people of the United States. The transfer of this capital from one of us to another promptly and safely should be facilitated. That means, however, that every bank of deposit is truly engaged in a national business. Its soundness and safety are of concern to our people everywhere. Our business of deposit banks is not local in character; it is, and should be, national. Therefore, in my judgment, it should be governed by the national law.

"I should hope, sir, that you might find a way to bring all State banks holding themselves out to do a national business and carrying demand deposits into the Federal Reserve System by compulsion."

Having failed to accomplish fully its purposes by creating the Federal Reserve System and inviting State banks to become members voluntarily and by modifying the safeguards contained in the National Bank Act and the Federal Reserve Act, in order to encourage the organization of national banks and to induce State banks to become members of the Federal Reserve System, Congress may resort to other measures. It can abandon inducement and resort to compulsion. In other words, it can prevent the transaction of a commercial banking business except by national banks, which must be members of the Federal Reserve System.

That Congress has the power to adopt this means to accomplish its great objects follows necessarily from the fundamental principles established by the Supreme Court of the United States in its decision in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland and the other cases discussed above; but there are also other reasons and additional authorities for this conclusion.

II. THE POWER TO PROVIDE A NATIONAL CURRENCY

A separate and independent ground for the above conclusion and an effective method of bringing all commercial banking into the national banking system are found in the measures adopted by Congress to provide a national currency for the Nation and in the decisions of the Supreme Court regarding the constitutionality of such measures.

By the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 484), later reenacted as the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 146), Congress imposed a tax of 10 percent on the circulating notes of State banks paid out by National or State banks. The avowed purpose of this legislation was to create a uniform currency by driving the circulating notes of State banks out of existence and, if necessary, by driving all State banks into the national banking system; and the Supreme Court of the United States upheld its constitutionality. (Veazie Bank v. Fenno (1869), 8 Wall. 533; 19 L.ed. 482.)

How near this legislation came to creating a unified banking system is indicated by the fact that up to November 15, 1864, there were only 584 national banks, with capital aggregating $81,961,450, and by October 1, 1865, there were 1,566 national banks, capitalized at $276,219,450. In 1862, prior to the passage of the National Bank Act, there were 1,492 State banks; in July 1864 there were 467 national banks and 1,089 State banks; in 1865 there were 1,294 national banks and 349 State banks; in 1866 there were 1,634 national banks and 297 State banks; and by 1868 the number of State banks fell to 247, the lowest figure for any time since 1857. (Report, National Monetary Commission, vol. 5, pp. 22, 103; Ann. Rept. Comp. Cur., 1931, p. 3.)

It is appropriate, therefore, to examine in this connection not only the legal basis for the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno, but also the circumstances giving rise to that opinion. While the situation then confronting Congress assumed a different form, the problem of the sixties and the method of its solution furnish a guide to the method of dealing with the problem of effecting desirable reforms in our present banking system.

In his report to Congress dated November 28, 1863 (p. 57), the Comptroller of the Currency said:

"* * * The idea that the national banks cannot supersede the State banks without breaking them down and ruining their stockholders is an erroneous one, and can only be honestly entertained by those who have not carefully considered the subject or noticed the process of conversion, which has changed some banks in the West, and is changing others in the East, from one system to the other. No war is being waged, or is intended to be waged, by the national system upon State institutions. So, far from it, it opens the way by which the interests of stockholders can be protected, at the same time that the character of their organizations is changed.

"* * * The amount of losses which the people have sustained by insolvent State banks and by the high rate of exchanges, the result of a depreciated currency, can hardly be estimated. That some of the new States have prospered, notwithstanding the vicious and ruinous banking systems with which they have been scourged, is evidence of the greatness of their resources and the energy of their people. The idea has at last become quite general among the people that the whole system of State banking, as far as circulation is regarded, is unfitted for a commercial country like ours. The United States is a nation as well as a union of States. Its vast railroad system extends from Maine to Kansas and will soon be extended to the Pacific Ocean. Its immense trade is not circumscribed by State lines, nor subject to State laws. Its internal commerce is national, and so should be its currency. At present some 1,500 State banks furnish the people with a bank-note circulation. This circulation is not confined to the States by which it is authorized, but is carried by trade or is forced by the banks all over the Union. People receive it and pay it out, scarcely knowing from whence it comes or in what manner it is secured. Banks have been organized in some States with a view to lending their circulation to the people of others. Probably not one quarter of the circulation of the New England banks is needed or used in New England, the balance being practically loaned to other States. The national currency system is intended to change this state of things, not by a war upon the State banks but by providing a means by which the circulation which is intended for national use shall be based upon national securities through associations organized under a national law." (Italics supplied.)

In his report of November 25, 1864, (p. 54) the Comptroller of the Currency said:

"As long as there was any uncertainty in regard to the success of the national banking system, or the popular verdict upon its merits and security, I did not feel at liberty to recommend discriminating legislation against the State banks. It is for Congress to determine if there is any longer a reasonable uncertainty on these points, and if the time has not arrived when all these institutions should be compelled to retire their circulation. It is indispensable for the financial success of the Treasury that the currency of the country should be under the control of the Government. This cannot be the case as long as State institutions have the right to flood the country with their issues. As a system has been devised under which State banks, or at least as many of them as are needed, can be reorganized, so that the Government can assume a rightful control over bank-note circulation, it could hardly be considered oppressive if Congress should prohibit the further issue of bank notes not authorized by itself, and compel, by taxation, (which should be sufficient to effect the object without being oppressive), the withdrawal of those which have been already issued. My own opinion is that this should be done, and that the sooner it is done the better it will be for the banks themselves and for the public. As long as the two systems are contending for the field (although the result of the contest can be no longer doubtful), the Government cannot restrain the issue of paper money; and as the preference which is everywhere given to a national currency over the notes of the State banks indicates what is the popular judgment in regard to the merits of the two systems, there seems to be no good reason why Congress should hesitate to relieve the Treasury of a serious embarrassment, and the people of an unsatisfactory circulation. (Italics supplied.)

The circumstances giving rise to the enactment of the act of March 3, 1865, and the purposes sought to be accomplished thereby were graphically described by Senator Sherman, Chairman of the Finance Committee, when he reported the bill to the Senate on February 27, 1865. His entire speech is worthy of careful study; but the following quotations will suffice. (Congressional Globe, 38th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 1138, 1139.):

"The people of the United States having definitely determined to prosecute war, it only remained for Congress to provide the ways and means to carry it on. * * * I still think that with parsimonious economy and heavy taxes from the beginning we might have borrowed money enough on a specie basis to have avoided a suspension of specie payments; but when it came, we were without a currency and without a system of taxation. Gold disappeared and was hoarded by banks and individuals. It flowed in a steady stream from our country. By the Subtreasury Act we could not use the irredeemable bills of State banks, and with the terrible lessons of 1815 and 1837 staring us in the face, no one was bold enough to advise us to make as a standard of value the issues of 1,500 banks founded upon as many banking systems as there were States. Under these circumstances we had but one resource.

"We had to borrow vast sums, and as a means to do it we had to make a currency. This was done by the issue of United States notes. Subsequently, to unite the interests of private capital with the security of the Government as a basis of banking, we established a system of national banks, and upon this currency, as a medium for collecting taxes and borrowing money, have waged a war unexampled in the grandeur of its operations, and, as I trust, soon to be crowned with unconditional success.

"A still more important feature of this bill is the section to compel the withdrawal of State-bank notes. As the volume of currency affects the price of all commodities, I have no doubt the amount of such paper money now outstanding adds to the cost of our purchases $50,000,000. The refusal of Congress, at the last session, to pass restrictive measures to compel its redemption has seriously affected the value of our currency. The national banks were intended to supersede the State banks. Both cannot exist together; yet, while the national system is extending, the issues of State banks have not materially decreased. Indeed, many local banks have been converted into national banks, and yet carefully keep out their State circulation. They exact interest from the people on this circulation, and yet avail themselves of the benefits of the new system. They transfer their capital to national banks, issue new circulation upon it, and yet studiously keep out the old. They issue two circulations upon the same capital. It is far better at once to abandon the national banking system than to leave it as a cloak for outstanding State issues.

"If the State banks have power enough in Congress to prolong their existence beyond the present year, we had better suspend the organization of national banks. As the first friend of this measure in the Senate, I would vote today for its repeal rather than allow it to be the agency under which State banks can inflate our currency. And the power of taxation cannot be more wisely exercised than in harmonizing and nationalizing and placing on the secure basis of national credit all the money of the country." (Italics supplied.)

The various legislative steps leading up to the passage of the act of July 13, 1866, were stated as follows in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall. 536–540) by Mr. Chief Justice Chase, who had been Secretary of the Treasury during the events related:

"At the beginning of the rebellion the circulating medium consisted almost entirely of bank notes issued by numerous independent corporations variously organized under State legislation, of various degrees of credit, and very unequal resources, administered often with great, and not unfrequently with little, skill, prudence, and integrity. The acts of Congress then in force prohibiting the receipt or disbursement, in the transactions of the National Government, of anything except gold and silver, and the laws of the States requiring the redemption of bank notes in coin on demand, prevented the disappearance of gold and silver from circulation. There was, then, no national currency except coin; there was no general regulation of any other by national legislation; and no national taxation was imposed in any form on the State bank circulation.

"The first act authorizing the emission of notes by the Treasury Department for circulation was that of July 17, 1861. The notes issued under this act were Treasury notes, payable on demand in coin. * * *

"On the 31st of December 1861 the State banks suspended specie payment. Until this time the expenses of the war had been paid in coin or in the demand notes just referred to; and, for some time afterward, they continued to be paid in these notes, which, if not redeemed in coin, were received as coin in the payment of duties.

"Subsequently, on the 25th of February 1862, a new policy became necessary in consequence of the suspension and of the condition of the country, and was adopted. The notes hitherto issued, as has just been stated, were called Treasury notes, and were payable on demand in coin. The act now passed authorized the issue of bills for circulation under the name of United States notes, made payable to bearer, but not expressed to be payable on demand, * * *.

"This currency, issued directly by the Government for the disbursement of the war and other expenditures, could not, obviously, be a proper object of taxation.

"But on the 25th of February 1863 the act authorizing national banking associations was passed, in which, for the first time during many years, Congress recognized the expediency and duty of imposing a tax upon currency. By this act a tax of 2 percent annually was imposed on the circulation of the associations authorized by it. Soon after, by the act of March 3, 1863, a similar but lighter tax of 1 percent annually was imposed on the circulation of State banks, in certain proportions to their capital, and of 2 percent on the excess; and the tax on the national associations was reduced to the same rates.

"At a later date, by the act of June 3, 1864, which was substituted for the act of February 25, 1863, authorizing national banking associations, the rate of tax on circulation was continued and applied to the whole amount of it, and the shares of their stockholders were also subjected to taxation by the States; and a few days afterward, by the act of June 30, 1864, to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, the tax on the circulation of the State banks was also continued at the same annual rate of 1 percent as before, but payment was required in monthly installments of one twelfth of 1 percent with monthly reports from each State bank of the amount in circulation.

"It can hardly be doubted that the object of this provision was to inform the proper authorities of the exact amount of paper money in circulation, with a view to its regulation by law.

"* * * The act just referred to was * * * followed some months later by the act of March 3, 1865, amendatory to the prior internal-revenue acts, the sixth section of which provides 'that every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of 10 percent on the amount of the notes of any State bank, or State banking association, paid out by them after the 1st day of July 1866.'

"The same provision was reenacted, with a more extended application, on the 13th of July 1866 in these words: 'Every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of 10 percent on the amount of notes of any person, State bank, or State banking association used for circulation, and paid out by them after the 1st day of August 1866, and such tax shall be assessed and paid in such manner as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.'

"The constitutionality of this last provision is now drawn in question, and this brief statement of the recent legislation of Congress has been made for the purpose of placing in a clear light its scope and bearing, especially as developed in the provisions just cited. It will be seen that when the policy of taxing bank circulation was first adopted in 1863, Congress was inclined to discriminate for, rather than against, the circulation of the State banks; but that when the country had been sufficiently furnished with a national currency by the issues of United States notes and of national bank notes, the discrimination was turned, and very decidedly turned, in the opposite direction."

Let us consider the present problem in the light of past experience: By the Revenue Act of 1932, approved June 6, 1932, Congress recently imposed a tax of 2 cents on each check, without making any distinction between checks drawn on State banks and those drawn on national banks. Is there any reason why Congress could not increase this tax to 10 percent of the amount of each check but exempt therefrom the checks drawn upon national banks and Federal Reserve banks, the instrumentalities which it has created to aid the Government in the performance of certain important functions?

While there are other grounds for holding that Congress could do so, adequate grounds for such a conclusion are contained in the reasons given by Mr. Chief Justice Chase for the Court's decision in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno.

After disposing of the contentions that the tax was a direct tax and had not been apportioned among the States, as required by the Constitution, and that the act imposing the tax impaired a franchise granted by the State, which it was urged Congress had no right to do, he stated and disposed of the principal question as follows (8 Wall. 548–550):

"It is insisted, however, that the tax in the case before us is excessive, and so excessive as to indicate a purpose on the part of Congress to destroy the franchise of the bank, and is, therefore, beyond the constitutional power of Congress.

"The first answer to this is that the judicial cannot prescribe to the legislative departments of the Government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the legislature is not to the courts but to the people by whom its members are elected. So if a particular tax bears heavily upon a corporation, or a class of corporations, it cannot, for that reason only, be pronounced contrary to the Constitution.

"But there is another answer which vindicates equally the wisdom and the power of Congress.

"It cannot be doubted that under the Constitution the power to provide a circulation of coin is given to Congress. And it is settled by the uniform practice of the Government and by repeated decisions, that Congress may constitutionally authorize the emission of bills of credit. It is not important here to decide whether the quality of legal tender, in payment of debts, can be constitutionally imparted to these bills; it is enough to say that there can be no question of the power of the Government to emit them; to make them receivable in payment of debts to itself; to fit them for use by those who see fit to use them in all the transactions of commerce; to provide for their redemption; to make them a currency, uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation. These powers, until recently, were only partially and occasionally exercised. Lately, however, they have been called into full activity, and Congress has undertaken to supply a currency for the entire country.

"The methods adopted for the supply of this currency were briefly explained in the first part of this opinion. It now consists of coin, of United States notes, and of the notes of the national banks. Both descriptions of notes may be properly described as bills of credit, for both are furnished by the Government, both are issued on the credit of the Government, and the Government is responsible for the redemption of both, primarily as to the first description, and immediately upon default of the bank, as to the second. When these bills shall be made convertible into coin, at the will of the holder, this currency will, perhaps, satisfy the wants of the community, in respect to a circulating medium, as perfectly as any mixed currency that can be devised.

"Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end, Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end, Congress may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile.

"Viewed in this light, as well as in the other light of a duty on contracts or property, we cannot doubt the constitutionality of the tax under consideration." (Italics supplied.)

Likewise, having undertaken to provide an elastic currency for the country by enacting the Federal Reserve Act, which authorized the issuance of Federal Reserve notes through the Federal Reserve banks, Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of that currency to the people by appropriate legislation.

Federal Reserve notes are secured by the assets of Federal Reserve banks; and the Federal Reserve banks depend largely upon their member banks to furnish the assets required for this purpose. They derive all their capital from subscriptions by member banks to their capital stock, and most of their deposits consist of the legal reserves deposited with them by their member banks.

In normal times Federal Reserve notes are secured largely by eligible paper acquired by the Federal Reserve banks from their member banks; and, as pointed out by the Federal Reserve Board in the circular quoted in part above, the Federal Reserve Act contemplated the creation of a banking system which would include most, if not all, of the commercial banks in the country.

This result not having been accomplished by the methods heretofore adopted, it would seem clear that Congress has the power to enact appropriate legislation in order to preserve for the Nation the full benefits of the flexible currency which it undertook to provide by the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act. If it finds that in order to accomplish this purpose it is necessary to prevent the transaction of a commercial banking business except by national banks, which must be members of the Federal Reserve System, Congress may constitutionally adopt this means, and the courts will not interfere, because the degree of the necessity for the enactment of such legislation is a question of legislative discretion, not of judicial cognizance. (McCulloch v. Maryland.)

At one time it was contended that Congress is not authorized to provide the people of the United States with a national currency; that the only power of this general character granted to it was the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and that this power is confined to matters pertaining to metallic money.

Such an argument was answered, however, in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Legal Tender cases (1871) (12 Wall. 457; 20 L.ed. 287), wherein the Supreme Court upheld the validity of certain acts of Congress making United States notes and Treasury notes legal tender for the payment of debts. In that case the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Strong, said (544–546):

"It is not easy to see why, if State-bank notes can be taxed out of existence for the purposes of indirectly making United States notes more convenient and useful for commercial purposes, the same end may not be secured directly by making them a legal tender.

"* * * The Constitution was intended to frame a government as distinguished from a league or compact, a government supreme in some particulars over States and people. It was designed to provide the same currency, having a uniform legal value in all the States. It was for this reason the power to coin money and regulate its value was conferred upon the Federal Government, while the same power as well as the power to emit bills of credit was withdrawn from the States. The States can no longer declare what shall be money, or regulate its value. Whatever power there is over the currency is vested in Congress. If the power to declare what is money is not in Congress, it is annihilated. * * * it might be argued with much force that when it is considered in what brief and comprehensive terms the Constitution speaks, how sensible its framers must have been that emergencies might arise when the precious metals (then more scarce than now) might prove inadequate to the necessities of the Government and the demands of the people—when it is remembered that paper money was almost exclusively in use in the States as the medium of exchange, and when the great evil sought to be remedied was the want of uniformity in the current value of money, it might be argued, we say, that the gift of power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, was understood as conveying general power over the currency, the power which had belonged to the States, and which they surrendered." (Italics supplied.)

In a separate concurring opinion Mr. Justice Bradley said (p. 562):

"Another ground of the power to issue Treasury notes or bills is the necessity of providing a proper currency for the country, and especially of providing for the failure or disappearance of the ordinary currency in times of financial pressure and threatened collapse of commercial credit. Currency is a national necessity. The operations of the Government, as well as private transactions, are wholly dependent upon it. The State governments are prohibited from making money or issuing bills. Uniformity of money was one of the objects of the Constitution. The coinage of money and regulation of its value is conferred upon the General Government exclusively. That Government has also the power to issue bills. It follows, as a matter of necessity, as a consequence of these various provisions, that it is specially the duty of the General Government to provide a national currency. The States cannot do it, except by the charter of local banks, and that remedy, if strictly legitimate and constitutional, is inadequate, fluctuating, uncertain, and insecure, and operates with all the partiality to local interests, which it was the very object of the Constitution to avoid. But regarded as a duty of the General Government, it is strictly in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, as well as in line with the national necessities." (Italics supplied.)

The tax imposed by the act of July 13, 1866, accomplished the object of eliminating the circulating notes of State banks and thus giving us a national currency of uniform value; but it has not accomplished the object of eliminating the competition of State banks and thus creating a unified commercial banking system as a basis for that currency.

Prior to the Civil War, banks derived most of their profits from the issuance of circulating notes and relied to a much lesser extent than they do now on deposits as a source of earning power.

In fact, the amount of their circulating notes frequently exceeded the amount of their deposits. (Rept. National Monetary Commission, vol. 5, pp. 16, 27.) It was expected, therefore, that the imposition of a prohibitive tax on their circulating notes would cause all State banks either to convert into national banks or to go out of business.

A way was soon found, however, to conduct a profitable banking business without issuing circulating notes. It was through the development of the use of checks in lieu of currency as a means of payment. This was convenient to depositors and profitable to the banks, since the latter could enjoy the use of the money pending its withdrawal and even while the checks were in process of collection; and the practice was encouraged by national banks as well as State banks. Moreover, arrangements facilitating the easy flow of checks throughout the country made the use of checks so popular that it has been estimated that, at the present time, more than 90 percent of all payments are made by means of checks.

Checks, therefore, have to a very large extent taken the place of currency as a medium of payment; and State banks, operating under laws allowing a greater latitude and requiring less rigorous supervision and regulation than the National Bank Act, have grown in number until, in the peak year of 1921, there were 20,349 State banks (other than mutual savings banks) compared with 8,154 national banks and, in 1931, there were 13,728 State banks compared with 6,805 national banks. The reduction in the number of banks of both classes resulted principally from failures and consolidations. (Ann. Rept. Compt. Currency, 1931, p. 3.)

Moreover, with the return of the predominance of State banks, many of the disadvantages of a heterogeneous banking structure have reappeared in another form; and checks, which have replaced currency as the principal medium of payment, frequently prove to be an ineffective medium. Checks go unpaid because the banks upon which they were drawn have failed. Balances against which depositors expected to draw checks in settlement of their business transactions are unavailable for that purpose, because the banks have closed their doors.

Not only has the effective operation of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System been seriously impaired by the "competition in laxity" of bank regulation and supervision, described in the statements of Governor Meyer and Mr. Owen D. Young quoted above, but the proportion of national banks to the total number of commercial banks in the country has fallen from 87 percent in 1868 to 38 percent in 1931; and only 38 percent of all the commercial banks were members of the Federal Reserve System in 1931. A material portion of commercial banking business, therefore, is conducted outside of the Federal Reserve System and contributes nothing to the basis for our currency.

The tax on circulating notes having become ineffective as a result of the use of checks in lieu of currency, Congress has the right to bring the act of July 13, 1866, up to date by making the tax applicable to checks drawn on State banks.

III. THE POWER TO REGULATE AND PROTECT INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Either one of the two grounds discussed above is sufficient to sustain the conclusion herein reached, but there is still another separate ground upon which the same conclusion could be sustained independently. The right to enact legislation to make banks more reliable instrumentalities of interstate commerce is included in the power granted to Congress by section 8 of article I of the Constitution, "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

In a long series of decisions this clause of the Constitution has been held to give Congress control over all phases of interstate commerce as well as over all other matters so connected with interstate commerce as to require congressional control over them in order to make effective the control over such commerce itself. The rule of these decisions is that "commerce" does not include merely the transfer of goods, but that the proper regulation of commerce must include the regulation of all aspects of commerce and of all instrumentalities upon which the carrying on of commerce depends. (Mondou v. New York, New Haven & Hartford R.R. Co., 223 U.S. 1; 32 Sup. Ct. 169.) Since the transportation system of the country is regarded as an essential instrumentality to this end, it has, under the commerce clause, been subjected to congressional regulation on a vast scale. Railroad cars not used in interstate commerce, but which may be placed in the same train with those that are, must conform to the Federal safety appliance act. (Southern Railway Co. v. United States, 222 U.S. 20; 32 Sup. Ct. 2.) Intrastate freight rates are subjected to Federal regulation when they interfere with interstate rates. (Railroad Commission of Wisconsin v. Chicago, B. & Q. R.R. Co., 257 U.S. 563; 42 Sup. Ct. 232.) The issuance of fraudulent bills of lading is punishable under a Federal statute even when they cover no interstate shipment. (United States v. Ferger, 250 U.S. 199; 39 Sup. Ct. 445.) Stockyards, although engaged in dealing locally in livestock, are subjected to Federal control, because they are essential cogs in the machinery of interstate commerce. (Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495; 42 Sup. Ct. 397.) The same is true of the principal grain markets. (Board of Trade of City of Chicago v. Olsen, 262 U.S. 1; 43 Sup. Ct. 470.) The decisions contain many other examples of a similar nature.

Although the courts have held that the powers of Congress under the commerce clause extend to a great variety of matters related to commerce—from the quality of radio broadcasting stations to the criminality of traffic in certain articles—no judicial interpretation nor any extension of the literal terms of that clause is necessary to make it include the very essentials of commerce, i. e., the acts of transferring the goods and of transmitting the consideration for them. The one is as essential as the other. A breakdown in the means of payment would be as disastrous as a breakdown in the means of shipment, since virtually every commercial transaction requires the services of a commercial bank for its consummation.

That the power to regulate commerce among the several States includes the power to remove obstructions and impediments to such commerce and to regulate the instrumentalities as well as the articles of that commerce is too well settled by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court to require argument. No attempt will be made, therefore, to review the multitude of decisions of the Supreme Court regarding the extent of this important power. A few leading cases will suffice.

The scope of the power of Congress over interstate commerce was stated concisely by the Supreme Court in Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R.R. Co. ((1911), 223 U.S. 1; 32 Sup. Ct. 169), wherein the Court sustained the validity of the Federal Employees' Liability Act and reaffirmed the power of Congress to determine the necessity for, and to enact, uniform national legislation to replace the variant State legislation governing the same subject (pp. 173, 174):

"The clauses in the Constitution (art. I, sec. 8, clauses 3 and 18) which confer upon Congress the power 'to regulate commerce * * * among the several States', and 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper' for the purpose, have been considered by this Court so often and in such varied connections that some propositions bearing upon the extent and nature of this power have come to be so firmly settled as no longer to be open to dispute, among them being these:

"1. The term 'commerce' comprehends more than the mere exchange of goods. It embraces commercial intercourse in all its branches, including transportation of passengers and property by common carriers, whether carried on by water or by land.

"2. The phrase 'among the several States' marks the distinction, for the purpose of governmental regulation, between commerce which concerns two or more States and commerce which is confined to a single State and does not affect other States—the power to regulate the former being conferred upon Congress and the regulation of the latter remaining with the States severally.

"3. 'To regulate,' in the sense intended, is to foster, protect, control, and restrain, with appropriate regard for the welfare of those who are immediately concerned and of the public at large.

"4. This power over commerce among the States, so conferred upon Congress, is complete in itself, extends incidentally to every instrument and agent by which such commerce is carried on, may be exerted to its utmost extent over every part of such commerce, and is subject to no limitations save such as are prescribed in the Constitution. But, of course, it does not extend to any matter or thing which does not have a real or substantial relation to some part of such commerce." (Italics supplied.)

That these considerations apply as much to the instruments as to the agents of such commerce, is shown by the brilliant passage which immediately follows in the opinion (p. 174):

"As is well said in the brief prepared by the late Solicitor General: 'Interstate commerce—if not always, at any rate when the commerce is transportation—is an act. Congress, of course, can do anything which, in the exercise by itself of a fair discretion, may be deemed appropriate to save the act of interstate commerce from prevention or interruption, or to make that act more secure, more reliable, or more efficient. The act of interstate commerce is done by the labor of men and with the help of things; and these men and things are the agents and instruments of the commerce. If the agents or instruments are destroyed while they are doing the act, commerce is stopped; if the agents or instruments are interrupted, commerce is interrupted; if the agents or instruments are not of the right kind or quality, commerce in consequence becomes slow or costly or unsafe or otherwise inefficient; and if the conditions under which the agents or instruments do the work of commerce are wrong or disadvantageous, those bad conditions may and often will prevent or interrupt the act of commerce or make it less expeditious, less reliable, less economical, and less secure. Therefore, Congress may legislate about the agents and instruments of interstate commerce, and about the conditions under which those agents and instruments perform the work of interstate commerce, whenever such legislation bears, or, in the exercise of a fair legislative discretion, can be deemed to bear, upon the reliability or promptness or economy or security or utility of the interstate commerce act.'" (Italics supplied.)

If banks are destroyed, commerce is stopped; if banks are suspended, commerce is interrupted; if banks are not of the right kind or quality, "commerce in consequence becames slow or costly or unsafe or otherwise inefficient"; and if the laws, regulations, and supervision under which banks perform their functions are wrong or inadequate, "these bad conditions may and often will prevent or interrupt the act of commerce or make it less expeditious, less reliable, less economical, and less secure." Therefore, it would seem that Congress may legislate about banks as agents and instruments of interstate commerce and may prescribe the conditions under which banks perform the work of finally consummating transactions in interstate commerce, "whenever such legislation bears, or, in the exercise of a fair legislative discretion, can be deemed to bear, upon the reliability or promptness or economy or security or utility" of the act of interstate commerce.

The fundamental incentive for interstate commerce is profit; and no transaction in interstate commerce is finally consummated until payment has been received for the goods which have been sold and shipped. In many instances, the very act of shipping goods in interstate commerce is inseparably connected with the forwarding, through a series of banks, of bills of lading attached to bills of exchange which must be paid or accepted before the goods are released. The ultimate payment which constitutes the object and the final act of nearly every transaction in interstate commerce is made by means of a check drawn upon a bank in one State in favor of a payee in another State; and such checks are forwarded for collection through a series of banks scattered over at least two, and frequently more, different States. Banks, therefore, are essential instrumentalities of interstate commerce.

Nearly every bank failure delays or prevents the final consummation of numerous transactions in interstate commerce by preventing or delaying the payment of the checks given in settlement therefor; and Congress clearly would be justified in finding that a heterogeneous banking system in which there have been more than 10,000 suspensions involving deposits amounting to nearly $5,000,000,000 since 1920, is a burden upon and an obstruction to interstate commerce.

Since "Congress * * * can do anything which, in the exercise by itself of a fair discretion, may be deemed appropriate to save the act of interstate commerce from prevention or interruption, or to make the act more secure, more reliable, or more efficient," it would seem clear that Congress can create a unified banking system in order to remove such an obstruction and burden to interstate commerce.

In Houston, etc., R. Co. v. United States (1914) (234 U.S. 342, 34 Sup. Ct. 833), wherein the Supreme Court sustained the validity of an act of Congress regulating purely intrastate freight rates when such rates were found by the Interstate Commerce Commission to interfere with interstate rates, the Court said (p. 836):

"It is unnecessary to repeat what has frequently been said by this Court with respect to the complete and paramount character of the power confided to Congress to regulate commerce among the several States. It is of the essence of this power that, where it exists, it dominates. Interstate trade was not left to be destroyed or impeded by the rivalries of local government. The purpose was to make impossible the recurrence of the evils which had overwhelmed the confederation, and to provide the necessary basis of national unity by insuring 'uniformity of regulation against conflicting and discriminating State legislation.' By virtue of the comprehensive terms of the grant, the authority of Congress is at all times adequate to meet the varying exigencies that arise, and to protect the national interest by securing the freedom of interstate commercial intercourse from local control." (Italics supplied.)

It has been recognized that one of the principal reasons for subjecting interstate commerce and matters related to it to national rather than local regulation is the fact that interstate commerce "is of national importance, and admits and requires uniformity of regulation." (Walton v. Missouri (1876), 91 U.S. 275.)

In Mondou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., supra, the Court said (p. 175):

"We are not unmindful that that end was being measurably attained through the remedial legislation of the several States, but that legislation has been far from uniform, and it undoubtedly rested with Congress to determine whether a national law, operating uniformly in all the States, upon all carriers by railroad engaged in interstate commerce, would better subserve the needs of that commerce." (Italics supplied.)

Obviously the same principle applies to banks or a banking system which Congress has created. See Easton v. Iowa, supra, wherein the Court said that the national-bank legislation "has in view the erection of a system extending throughout the country, and independent, so far as powers conferred are concerned, of State legislation which, if permitted to be applicable, might impose limitations and restrictions as various and as numerous as the States."

It is not only within the power of Congress, therefore, to create a unified banking system in order to remove existing impediments and obstructions to interstate commerce resulting from the existence of 48 different State banking systems but it is also right, meet, and proper for Congress to do so, since the object is a national one which can be dealt with effectively only by the National Legislature.

This conclusion is not based upon the theory that the banking business is itself commerce, but upon the fact that banks are instrumentalities of interstate commerce and that an unsound and unsatisfactory banking system is a burden upon and an impediment to interstate commerce.

If, therefore, Congress decides to solve this problem through the exercise of its powers over interstate commerce and as a means to removing an obstruction to interstate commerce, it need not confine the legislation to transactions of an interstate character, but may legislate for the banking system as a whole, since every commercial bank actually functions as an instrumentality of interstate commerce and every failure of a commercial bank obstructs and impedes the consummation of numerous transactions in interstate commerce.

The effective regulation of interstate commerce requires the regulation of some matters which in and of themselves are not interstate commerce, but which have a direct relationship to such commerce. In other words, if the transaction which is of itself purely intrastate is a vital part of interstate commerce, the regulation of that transaction may be undertaken by Congress under the commerce clause.

In Stafford v. Wallace (1922) (258 U.S. 495; 42 Sup. Ct. 397) the Court considered the validity of an act of Congress which, among other things, provided for Federal supervision and control of stockyards. The Court found that, although many of their transactions are purely local, the business of the packers and of the stockyards is an integral and essential part of the interstate commerce in livestock and meat, and accordingly held the statute to be a valid exercise of the power conferred on Congress by the commerce clause.

In rendering the opinion of the Court, Mr. Chief Justice Taft said (pp. 517, 521):

"* * * The only question here is whether the business done in the stockyards, between the receipt of the livestock in the yards and the shipment of them therefrom, is a part of interstate commerce, or is so associated with it as to bring it within the power of national regulation. A similar question has been before this Court and had great consideration in Swift v. United States (196 U.S. 375; 25 Sup. Ct. 376; 49 L.ed. 518). The judgment in that case gives a clear and comprehensive exposition, which leaves to us in this case little but the obvious application of the principles there declared.

* * * * * * *

"* * * Whatever amounts to more or less constant practice, and threatens to obstruct or unduly to burden the freedom of interstate commerce is within the regulatory power of Congress under the commerce clause, and it is primarily for Congress to consider and decide the fact of the danger and meet it. This Court will certainly not substitute its judgment for that of Congress in such a matter unless the relation of the subject to interstate commerce and its effect upon it are clearly nonexistent." (Italics supplied.)

Two cases dealing with congressional legislation regarding grain futures markets have an important bearing not only upon the right of Congress to regulate the commercial banking business in order to prevent an obstruction to interstate commerce but also upon the proper method of preparing such legislation.

In the first of these cases, Hill v. Wallace (1922) (259 U.S. 44; 42 Sup. Ct. 453), an act of Congress designed to regulate the conduct of business boards of trade through the exercise of the power of taxation was held to be unconstitutional. In Board of Trade v. Olsen (1923) (262 U.S. 1; 43 Sup. Ct. 470), however, the Court upheld the validity of a statute having the same object, on the ground that it was intended to remove an obstruction or interference with interstate commerce in the form of price manipulation and control in these markets.

Unlike the statute held unconstitutional in Hill v. Wallace, the statute which was sustained as constitutional in Board of Trade v. Olsen clearly stated its relation to interstate commerce. It contained a recital and finding of the facts disclosed in the hearings and committee reports to the effect that transactions in grain involving sales for future delivery as commonly conducted on boards of trade are affected with a national public interest and that they are susceptible of speculation, manipulation, and control resulting in fluctuations in prices which constitute an obstruction to and a burden upon interstate commerce in grain.

With certain exceptions the act forbade boards of trade to use the mails or interstate telephone, telegraphic, wireless, or other communication in offering or accepting sales of grain for future delivery or to disseminate prices or quotations thereof unless such boards of trade are located at terminal markets which have been designated by the Secretary of Agriculture as contract markets, comply with certain regulations and restrictions contained in the act, and submit to the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

In rendering the opinion of the Court sustaining the constitutionality of the act, Mr. Chief Justice Taft said (262 U.S. 31–41; 43 Sup. Ct. 475–479):

"Appellants contend that the decision of this Court in Hill v. Wallace (259 U.S. 44) is conclusive against the constitutionality of the Grain Futures Act. Indeed in their bill they pleaded the judgment in that case as res judicata in this, as to its invalidity. The act whose constitutionality was in question in Hill v. Wallace was the Future Trading Act (c. 86, 42 Stat. 187). It was an effort by Congress, through taxing at a prohibitive rate sales of grain for future delivery, to regulate such sales on boards of trade by exempting them from the tax if they would comply with the congressional regulations. It was held that sales for future delivery, where the parties were present in Chicago, to be settled by offsetting purchases or by delivery to take place there, were not interstate commerce and that Congress could not use its taxing power in this indirect way to regulate business not within Federal control."

* * * * * * *

"The Grain Futures Act which is now before us differs from the Future Trading Act in having the very features the absence of which we held in the somewhat carefully framed language of the foregoing prevented our sustaining the Future Trading Act. As we have seen in the statement of the case, the act only purports to regulate interstate commerce and sales of grain for future delivery on boards of trade because it finds that by manipulation they have become a constantly recurring burden and obstruction to that commerce. Instead, therefore, of being an authority against the validity of the Grain Futures Act, it is an authority in its favor."

"It is impossible to distinguish the case at bar, so far as it concerns the cash grain, the sales to arrive, and the grain actually delivered in fulfillment of future contracts, from the current of stock shipment declared to be interstate commerce in Stafford v. Wallace (285 U.S. 495; 42 Sup. Ct. 497; 66 L.ed. 735). That case presented the question whether sales and purchases of cattle made in Chicago at the stockyards by commission men and dealers and traders under the rules of the stockyards corporation could be brought by Congress under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture to prevent abuses of the commission men and dealers in exorbitant charges and other ways, and in their relations with packers prone to monopolize trade and depress and increase prices thereby. It was held that this could be done, even though the sales and purchases by commission men and by dealers were in and of themselves intrastate commerce, the parties to sales and purchases and the cattle all being at the time within the city of Chicago.

"This case was but the necessary consequence of the conclusions reached in the case of Swift & Co. v. United States (196 U.S. 375, 25 Sup. Ct. 276, 49 L.ed. 518). That case was a milestone in the interpretation of the commerce clause of the Constitution. It recognized the great changes and development in the business of this vast country and drew again the dividing line between interstate and intrastate commerce where the Constitution intended it to be. It refused to permit local incidents of great interstate movement, which taken alone were intrastate, to characterize the movement as such. The Swift case merely fitted the commerce clause to the real and practical essence of modern business growth. It applies to the case before us just as it did in Stafford v. Wallace.

"In the act we are considering, Congress has expressly declared that transactions and prices of grain in dealing in futures are susceptible to speculation, manipulation, and control which are detrimental to the producer and consumer and persons handling grain in interstate commerce and render regulation imperative for the protection of such commerce and the national public interest therein.

"It is clear from the citations, in the statement of the case, of evidence before committees of investigation as to manipulations of the futures market and their effect, that we would be unwarranted in rejecting the finding of Congress as unreasonable, and that in our inquiry as to the validity of this legislation we must accept the view that such manipulation does work to the detriment of producers, consumers, shippers, and legitimate dealers in interstate commerce in grain and that it is a real abuse.

"* * * The question of price dominates trade between the States. Sales of an article which affect the country-wide price of the article directly affect the country-wide commerce in it. By reason and authority, therefore, in determining the validity of this act, we are prevented from questioning the conclusion of Congress that manipulation of the market for futures on the Chicago Board of Trade may, and from time to time does, directly burden and obstruct commerce between the States in grain, and that it recurs and is a constantly possible danger. For this reason, Congress has the power to provide the appropriate means adopted in this act by which this abuse may be restrained and avoided." (Italics supplied.)

Likewise, if Congress finds that our present banking system, which has given rise to more than 10,000 bank failures since 1920, which necessarily have delayed and obstructed the consummation of innumerable transactions in interstate commerce, is a burden upon and obstruction to interstate commerce, the Supreme Court would not be warranted in rejecting the finding of Congress as unreasonable or in concluding that legislation designed to correct this situation and remove such an obstruction to interstate commerce is not a proper exercise of the power to regulate commerce among the States.

If the purchase and sale of cattle by commission men, dealers, and traders at the Chicago stockyards, and the sale of grain for future delivery on the Chicago Board of Trade and the dissemination of prices and quotations thereof, can be brought by Congress under the supervision of the Federal Government, on the ground that abuses in such business constitute obstructions to interstate commerce, it seems clear that the transaction of a commercial banking business, involving the payment of checks given in settlement of transactions in interstate commerce and the handling of innumerable bills of exchange secured by bills of lading growing out of transactions in interstate commerce, can also be brought under the supervision of the Federal Government.

Such cases as Hammer v. Dagenhart (1918) (247 U.S. 251, 38 Sup. Ct. 529) and Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co. (1922) (259 U.S. 20; 42 Sup. Ct. 449), need not be distinguished in detail, because they relate to Federal legislation wherein Congress attempted to deal with purely local questions having no essential connection with interstate commerce, whereas commercial banking is a matter of national rather than local concern and is essentially connected with and inextricably related to interstate commerce.

Federal legislation to relieve interstate commerce of the impediments and obstructions resulting from a heterogeneous and inefficient banking structure would not constitute an invasion of the rights of the States, because it would relate to a subject which the fathers of the Constitution clearly intended to intrust to the National Government, in order that we might have a Nation and not a mere confederation of States, and in order that the free flow of commerce between the different parts of the Nation might not be impeded by State legislation.

The importance of banking as an indispensable aid to commerce has already been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Noble State Bank v. Haskell (1911) (219 U.S. 104; 31 Sup Ct. 186), wherein the Court said, through Mr. Justice Holmes (p. 188):

"* * * Among matters of that sort probably few would doubt that both usage and preponderant opinion give their sanction to enforcing the primary conditions of successful commerce. One of those conditions at the present time is the possibility of payment by checks drawn against bank deposits, to such an extent do checks replace currency in daily business. * * * Even the primary object * * * is not a private benefit, * * * but it is to make the currency of checks secure and by the same stroke to make safe the almost compulsory resort of depositors to banks as the only available means for keeping money on hand * * *." (Italics supplied.)

It is appropriate and in accordance with the fundamental principles of our Government for Congress to undertake the task of making "the currency of checks secure", because it is essential to the free and unhampered flow of commerce between the States, the regulation of which is intrusted to Congress alone by the Constitution.

If Congress should decide that more effective regulation and supervision of the commercial banking business is desirable in order to make the currency of checks secure, it is peculiarly fitting and proper that Congress should undertake to provide that remedy because the problem is not a local one but relates directly to matters of national concern which are expressly intrusted to Congress by the Constitution.

In the case of United States v. Ferger (1919), 250 U.S. 199, the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the constitutionality of section 41 of the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. 538), which provides for the punishment of any person who forges or counterfeits a bill of lading, even though that section applies to cases where no shipment from one State to another is made or intended. The Court held that, in order to protect and sustain interstate commerce, Congress may prohibit and punish the forgery and utterance of bills of lading for fictitious shipments in interstate commerce.

In delivering the opinion of the Court, Mr. Chief Justice White said (250 U.S. 203–205):

"* * * Thus both in the pleadings and in the contention as summarized by the court below it is insisted that, as there was and could be no commerce in a fraudulent and fictitious bill of lading, therefore the power of Congress to regulate commerce could not embrace such pretended bill. But this mistakenly assumes that the power of Congress is to be necessarily tested by the intrinsic existence of commerce in the particular subject dealt with, instead of by the relation of that subject to commerce and its effect upon it. We say "mistakenly assumes" because we think it clear that if the proposition were sustained it would destroy the power of Congress to regulate, as obviously that power, if it is to exist, must include the authority to deal with obstructions to interstate commerce (In re Debs, 158 U.S. 564) and with a host of other acts which, because of their relation to and influence upon interstate commerce, come within the power of Congress to regulate, although they are not interstate commerce in and of themselves. It would be superfluous to refer to the authorities which from the foundation of the Government have measured the exertion by Congress of its power to regulate commerce by the principle just stated, since the doctrine is elementary and is but an expression of the text of the Constitution (art. I, sec. 8, clause 18). A case dealing with a somewhat different exercise of power, but affording a good illustration of the application of the principle to the subject in hand, is First National Bank v. Union Trust Co., (244 U.S. 416).

"* * * That, as instrumentalities of interstate commerce, bills of lading are the efficient means of credit resorted to for the purpose of securing and fructifying the flow of a vast volume of interstate commerce upon which the commercial intercourse of the country, both domestic and foreign, largely depends, is a matter of common knowledge as to the course of business of which we may take judicial notice. Indeed, that such bills of lading and the faith and credit given to their genuineness and the value they represent are the producing and sustaining causes of the enormous number of transactions in domestic and foreign exchange is also so certain and well known that we may notice it without proof.

"With this situation in mind, the question, therefore, is, Was the court below right in holding that Congress had no power to prohibit and punish the fraudulent making of spurious interstate bills of lading as a means of protecting and sustaining the vast volume of interstate commerce operating and moving in reliance upon genuine bills? To state the question is to manifest the error which the court committed. * * * It proceeds further, as we have already shown, upon the erroneous theory that the credit and confidence which sustains interstate commerce would not be impaired or weakened by the unrestrained right to fabricate and circulate spurious bills of lading apparently concerning such commerce. Nor is the situation helped by saying that as the manufacture and use of the spurious interstate commerce bills of lading were local, therefore the power to deal with them was exclusively local, since the proposition disregards the fact that the spurious bills were in the form of interstate commerce bills which in and of themselves involved the potentiality of fraud as far-reaching and all-embracing as the flow of the channels of interstate commerce in which it was contemplated the fraudulent bills would circulate. As the power to regulate the instrumentality was coextensive with interstate commerce, so it must be, if the authority to regulate is not to be denied, that the right to exert such authority for the purpose of guarding against the injury which would result from the making and use of spurious imitations of the instrumentality must be equally extensive." (Italics supplied.)

The reference to the Court's decision in the case of First National Bank v. Union Trust Co., which appears at the end of the first paragraph quoted from the opinion in the Ferger case, is significant, because that is the case discussed elsewhere in this opinion, wherein the Supreme Court upheld the right of Congress to grant trust powers to national banks in order to enable them to compete with State banks and trust companies. While that case dealt with a somewhat different exercise of power, the Supreme Court recognized that it afforded a good illustration of the application of the principle to the subject dealt with in the Ferger case. Conversely, it would seem that the Court would not hesitate to apply the principle underlying its decision in the Ferger case to the subject of banking.

If bills of lading are instrumentalities of interstate commerce, so are checks and the banks upon which they are drawn, and if Congress has the right to prohibit and to punish the fraudulent making of spurious bills of lading in order to protect and sustain the vast volume of interstate commerce operating and moving in reliance upon genuine bills, then Congress must have the right to enact legislation to safeguard the use of checks in order to protect and sustain the vast volume of interstate commerce which is consummated by payments made by means of checks. Since the safe use of checks depends primarily upon the solvency of the banks upon which they are drawn, Congress must have the right to enact legislation to promote the safer and more effective operation of commercial banks.

Nor is Congress prevented from exercising this power by the fact that part of the business of commercial banks is purely local in character; but the power to regulate interstate commerce "must include the authority to deal with obstructions to interstate commerce * * * and with a host of other acts which, because of their relation to and influence upon interstate commerce, come within the power of Congress to regulate, although they are not interstate commerce in and of themselves."

If Congress in its wisdom should find that our heterogeneous banking structure, which has given rise to more than 10,000 bank failures in the last 12 years, constitutes a burden upon or an obstruction to interstate commerce, therefore, there can be no doubt that Congress has the constitutional power to correct the situation by bringing all commercial banking business into a single system subject to effective regulation and supervision by the Federal Government, to the end that the currency of checks upon which practically every transaction in interstate commerce depends for its consummation may be made more secure.

IV. METHODS WHICH COULD BE ADOPTED

Having the power to enact such legislation, Congress could exercise the power in any manner which it deems appropriate and adequate for this purpose. It is not necessary that the legislation assume the form of a revenue act or an act to regulate interstate commerce, though either of these means would be appropriate. In the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Stafford v. Wallace and Board of Trade of Chicago v. Olsen, however, it would be desirable for such legislation to contain findings of fact and a recital of the national objects to be attained, as did the Grain Futures Act.

Among the constitutional means which Congress could adopt in order to accomplish these objects or to aid in their accomplishment are the following:

(1) It could forbid the receipt of deposits subject to withdrawal by check by any individual, partnership, or corporation other than a bank organized under the laws of the United States and provide suitable penalties for violations of this prohibition.

(2) It could impose a prohibitive tax on all checks and similar documents drawn on, or payable at, banks not organized under the laws of the United States.

(3) It could forbid any officer of the United States or any Federal Reserve bank, national bank, Federal land bank, joint-stock land bank, Federal intermediate credit bank, or Federal home-loan bank to receive in payment, on deposit, for the purposes of exchange or collection, or for any other purpose, any check drawn upon any bank not organized under the laws of the United States.

(4) It could forbid any bank organized under the laws of the United States to make loans or extend credit to, or deposit any of its funds in, or permit the use of any of its facilities by, any commercial bank not organized under such laws.

(5) It could forbid the deposit of public funds of the United States in any bank not organized under the laws of the United States.

(6) It could exempt all national banks from taxation, State or Federal, except taxes on real estate.

In order to be completely effective, the legislation could combine several of the measures suggested above. Thus, a comprehensive bill on this subject might include the following:

(1) A finding of facts by the Congress (on the basis of evidence already obtained pursuant to S.Res. 71 and other evidence which may be produced) to the effect that, in order (a) to provide for the safe and more effective operation of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, (b) to preserve for the people the full benefits of the currency provided for by the Congress, and (c) to relieve interstate commerce of the burdens and obstructions resulting from the existing situation, it is necessary to restrict the business of receiving deposits subject to withdrawal by check to national banks and thereby to subject all commercial banking business to national regulation and supervision;

(2) A prohibition against the receipt of deposits subject to withdrawal by check except by banks organized under the laws of the United States;

(3) A prohibition against any officer of the United States or any bank organized under the laws of the United States receiving in payment, on deposit, for exchange or collection, or for any other purpose, any check drawn upon any bank not organized under such laws;

(4) A prohibition against any bank organized under the laws of the United States making loans or extending credits to depositing any of its funds in, or permitting the use of any of its facilities by, any commercial banking institution not organized under such laws;

(5) A provision imposing a prohibitive tax on all checks or substitutes therefor drawn upon or payable at any bank not organized under the laws of the United States; and

(6) A provision prescribing suitable penalties for violations of the above provisions.

If such legislation is enacted, its effective date necessarily would have to be postponed for a sufficient length of time to avoid too sudden and revolutionary a change in our existing financial structure and to allow time for existing State banks to adjust themselves to the situation, by converting into national banks or discontinuing the transaction of commercial banking business.

The time intervening between the enactment of such legislation and the date when it becomes effective could be devoted to the preparation and enactment of additional legislation for the purpose of providing further for the more effective operation, regulation, and supervision of the national banking system and the Federal Reserve System, by repealing undesirable amendments to the National Bank Act and Federal Reserve Act which grew out of the competition in laxity, equipping the supervisory authorities with adequate powers to enable them to perform their functions more effectively, and adopting such other measures as might be deemed appropriate.

Respectfully,

WALTER WYATT,
General Counsel.

WASHINGTON, D.C., December 5, 1932.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and there hereby is, created a national corporation which shall be known as the United Communities.

SEC. 2. That the purpose of the said corporation shall be to establish a series of communities throughout the United States, at such locations as may be deemed proper and convenient, and to secure land, housing, machinery, and other equipment as the same may be required for the accommodation, employment, and maintenance of families and individuals, citizens of the United States, who shall be engaged in productive employment under the direction of the said corporation.

The memorandum submitted by Mr. SHEPPARD was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM IN EXPLANATION OF THE PROPOSED BILL FOR THE PURPOSE OF PROVIDING INDUSTRIAL AND AGRICULTURAL COMMUNITIES FOR THE ABSORPTION OF UNEMPLOYED CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES, AND FOR THE ISSUANCE OF SELF-LIQUIDATING BONDS FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT THEREOF

In explanation of this bill I feel it fair to give something of the practical side of our organization which has been in operation now under me for 13 years. During this time we have had less than $100,000 in cash supplied us from sales of stock and donations, which is the only means of financing the organization outside of our own production.

During the 13 years we have been able to establish eight of these units, and at the same time carry on the enormous expense of education and development at the home unit in Newllano.

We have had a tremendous expense to meet as an educational feature, both for our schools and in the movement itself. I am convinced that $5,000,000 would be a sufficient amount of money to develop 20 of these units, especially in the southern portion of the United States where food can be grown through a long period of the year, and where materials for food, clothing, and shelter can be obtained in abundance and with a minimum of cost.

We are thoroughly convinced from the practical experience we have gone through in this demonstration that after one set-up of this program is made, it, in itself, from the surplus production, will soon be in a position to finance other units, and take off of the Government in a very short time the burden of financing the program. If great speed is necessary to put the unemployed army to work, naturally it will call for more cash than if a greater time is taken in putting these people to work.

In liquidating the bonds the point is made that in the event these people are not selling their goods or commodities in the regular channels of trade, which would put them in competition with the present order of business, their only method of liquidating the bonds and paying the interest would be to turn to the Government for it to use in connection with the Army, Navy, or other governmental institutions their surplus. The Government could credit them on a basis of cash which would make the matter only a question of bookkeeping.

During the years of the depression we have been able to take into our organization food and clothes, and to house twice as many people as are bona fide members of the organization; in other words, absorb into our unit more unemployed, destitute people, 2 to 1, than we had members themselves, and those people are given the same food, clothing, and shelter and a lifetime opportunity that we have for ourselves.

As to the salaries of the first nine men, I should say that I can select nine men who will function on this board without one dollar of compensation as salary, working, as we do, on the basis of livelihood only.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR CAPPER ON HIGH COST OF HOUSING IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address made by the senior Senator from Kansas ([Mr. CAPPER] at a mass meeting of Government employees on the high cost of housing in the District of Columbia, Friday, March 31, 1933, at McKinley High School Auditorium.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends, I welcome this opportunity to meet with you here tonight to discuss the high cost of housing in the District of Columbia.

According to the best economic thought, rent should take not more than one quarter of the family budget. But how many of you are paying out a good deal more than one fourth of your reduced salaries for housing? You are now confronted by an additional cut in your wages. This will bring about a further disproportion between your incomes and the amount you pay in rent.

I think it is vitally necessary that drastic action be taken in the immediate future to bring about a fair reduction in rents in Washington. What effective action can be taken? How soon can some definite good be accomplished? Who will take the initiative in this work of rent reform? These are the questions which I shall attempt to answer this evening.

First, however, let me say to you most emphatically that I do not intend to waste sympathy or effort on persons who are trying to "keep up with the Joneses" in the matter of living accommodations.

Every one of you knows that there always will be dwellings and apartment houses where rents will be high. These places are for persons of considerable means who are not obliged to count their pennies. Now, if they want to pay fancy rents for exclusive neighborhoods or palatial apartments, that is their concern. But the salaried man who deliberately moves into one of these show places, knowing that he will have trouble in paying the rent, is not entitled to any consideration. If he wants to put on a front, as the saying goes, let him pay the price of his folly. But he need not expect much consideration if he complains that the rent he is paying is too much.

We can forget about that type of tenant. My interest is not in him, but in the plain people of Washington—in the families who are worrying along from month to month trying to keep a roof over their heads and to give their children an education. Many such people are in this assembly tonight. They are striving earnestly to keep their heads above water, to pay their bills as they go along, and not get into debt.

These people do not live in pretentious homes. They are not trying to maintain a false standard of living. They live decently and quietly in the manner of the average Washingtonian. If they work for the Government, as you do, they have had to figure their budget more closely since the retrenchment program of the Government began. But now they are looking with despair at that household budget soon to be unbalanced by a further salary cut.

Where are these people going to live after their pay has been reduced? We cannot drive these families into the alleys of Washington or into neighborhoods where none of you would want to bring up your children.

High rents have done enough damage to Washington. They have forced families to double up in living quarters, a practice that offends good health, morals, and comfort. High rents in Washington have worked a grave injustice to a population that is still paying boom-time rents from depression incomes. Rents in Washington have been coming down slowly since 1928, according to the latest information from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, but the drop has been insignificant, in comparison with the needs of the people of Washington.

My interest in the present rent situation was aroused early last year, when it became evident that Government salaries were to be reduced. I had been receiving letters from Washingtonians complaining of high rents, but I wanted to find out whether the feeling was general that rents should come down.

I mentioned publicly my interest in the matter, and I got an immediate response from the people of Washington. Letters came in by the hundreds, not only to me but to other members of the Senate District Committee, urging that some steps be taken to bring about a lower rent level in the District. I consulted the records of the Bureau of Labor Statistics as to rental charges in other cities to see whether these numerous complaints of exorbitant rentals in Washington were justified. I found that these entirely impersonal figures, collected by the Government and based on a large number of rentals on homes of workingmen and their families throughout the country, supported the contentions of the Washington tenants.

The District Committee was deeply concerned when the facts were laid before them. Other members and myself urged on landlords and real-estate agents the pressing necessity for action in behalf of the tenants. I am sorry to say that we received very little assistance from the real-estate interests in our efforts at that time.

Because of this attitude on the part of landlords and agents, and because of serious charges made by tenants concerning the conduct of the real-estate business in the District, it became the duty of the committee to request the Senate for authority to inquire into all the facts concerning rents in Washington. The Senate gave this authority very readily.

Now, let me say to you in all sincerity that the Senate District Committee had no desire to embark on a tedious investigation in the summer of 1932. One of the stormiest sessions of Congress was drawing to a tumultuous close. I was tired and so, I believe, was every other member of the committee. We did our utmost to obtain from the real-estate men some assurance that they would recognize their responsibility and reduce rents to a reasonable level. But that assurance was not forthcoming, and the inquiry was begun.

We began our work in June. The investigation was completed in December. During that time the average of rents began to decline, but at a snail's pace. In the meantime the impression had grown among the people that the Senate had created a rent commission charged with the duty of looking into individual cases and reducing rents where warranted. Now, we had no legal right to do that. Our sole responsibility was to collect the facts and report our findings and recommendations to the Senate.

I can look back with pride on the rent investigation. It was conducted with great economy and developed the information on which to base a far-reaching and progressive legislative program on housing in the District.

Briefly, this is what our subcommittee on the rent investigation told the Senate as to the rental situation here:

"A state of emergency in housing exists in the District of Columbia. Almost 10 percent of the families in the District are destitute and entirely dependent on public or private relief. Thousands more are existing on pitifully small incomes, which may be utterly wiped out by illness or unemployment of breadwinners.

"There is in the District a dire lack of low-cost sanitary housing. This is accentuated by the inability of municipal relief authorities to find adequate housing for families made homeless by eviction. Unable to match their reduced incomes against present rent levels, residents of the District are resorting to the practice of 'doubling up' * * *. Rents in the District of Columbia have not been reduced sufficiently to meet the needs of the people.

"Rent levels in the District do not reflect the decline in the costs of practically all other commodities, nor do they show the same decline as do rents in other cities.

"Rents of apartments in the District underwent an average reduction of less than 7 percent during the past year, while the rate of vacancies in apartments increased 10 percent.

"Rent reductions in houses were so insignificant that it may be stated that such rents show practically no change from those of a year ago."

That is the report our committee made to the Senate a few weeks ago.

The subcommittee also reported, in the strongest possible terms, that the real-estate business in the District, including the activities of rental agents, had drifted into practices and policies opposed to the public interest. I quote from the report on that point:

"Although assurances were given the subcommittee by real-estate brokers that the era of high financing in Washington real estate is a thing of the past, the subcommittee is convinced that many of the evils of the present rental situation find their roots in a vicious system of financing and related functions, largely noncompetitive, which has encouraged and fostered speculation and has placed a crushing burden of interest, commissions, insurance, and title costs on every real-estate transaction.

"Under this system the small-home buyer suffers alike with the owners of equities in rental property.

"The lack of proper and sufficient legal safeguards has nurtured this system, the fruits of which are summary foreclosures, vast losses to investors in real-estate securities, and, in part at least, high rents."

The subcommittee also censured the Washington Real Estate Board for its part in the rent situation. The report referred to evidence produced at the hearings which indicated that the board in many ways had acted to eliminate competition among its members, through various restrictions on their activities and through fixing rates of commissions on real-estate transactions.

The report also dealt with the general attitude of the board to the public. In this respect the report stated:

"In the opinion of the subcommittee the public policies of the Washington Real Estate Board have been deficient in many respects, and unresponsive to the legitimate needs of the public.

"Representatives of the board have offered no constructive suggestions for improvement of the rental situation. Their demand for a fair return on the assessed value of their property displays a woeful disregard of present-day economic conditions in the District of Columbia and in the country as a whole."

I hold no brief for the Washington Real Estate Board. I concur in the report of the subcommittee. But I know several members of the board, and I believe them to be upright and public-spirited men. I think the subcommittee was absolutely right in its analysis of the situation, which showed that men engaged in the real-estate business in Washington had permitted themselves to fall into mistakes of policy. Knowing some of these men as I do, I cannot help but believe that the investigation has served to show them how far their organization had gotten away from the ideals of public service.

There is a decidedly hopeful development in the announcement by the board to the effect that a special committee of board members has been appointed to consider the complaints of tenants and, if possible, to rectify injustices.

Regardless, however, of this commendable action by the real-estate board, I think that action should be had on the recommendation of the subcommittee which calls for the passage of a Senate resolution calling on the Attorney General to make a complete investigation of charges that competition in real-estate transactions has been stifled in the District of Columbia. I think the people are entitled to have the benefit of the Attorney General's opinion as to the legality of the actions of the real-estate board.

This proposal, however, is only part of the general housecleaning that is needed in the local real-estate situation. I think we all realize that the mere enactment of legislation is not sufficient to correct wrongs against the public interest. It is essential that good laws, if passed, shall be enforced fairly and impartially.

Our subcommittee recommended a legislative program which is comprehensive and strikes at the principal evils in the local situation. I am certain that public opinion will get behind these laws and see that they are enforced after they have been enacted.

It had been my wish to get action on this legislation in the last session of Congress. But, through unavoidable delays, the report of the subcommittee was late in getting to the Senate, and too little time remained for completion of our work.

As you know, when the Democrats organized the Senate after the 4th of March, Senator KING, of Utah, became Chairman of the District Committee in my place. Senator KING has been a student of District affairs for many years. During my 8 years as chairman he was one of the most helpful and conscientious members of the committee.

Soon after assuming the chairmanship he appointed me chairman of a special subcommittee to take charge of the rent-investigation report and carry out its recommendations. I can say to you that I am prepared to go ahead with this work as rapidly as care and proper deliberation will permit. I shall do my best to see that justice is done the people who are now suffering from high rents.

I have communicated with the corporation counsel of the District to ask his assistance in preparing legislation along the lines recommended in the rent report. To give you an idea of just what is proposed in this legislation, let me quote once more from the report:

"Recognizing the present emergency in housing, and in view of evidence and testimony contained in the record of the investigation, the subcommittee recommends to the Senate the following actions:

"A. Consideration at an early date of such legislation as will limit evictions of tenants when conditions are such as to merit the intervention of the Government in their behalf; legislation to provide a moratorium for not exceeding 2 years upon the foreclosure of mortgages and deeds of trust on homes; legislation to confer on the Commissioners authority to take such action as may be required for the protection of tenants in cases of extreme emergency."

Recommendation "B" relates to the proposed investigation by the Attorney General of the rent-combine charges. I have previously referred to that, so let us now go to the next:

"C. Passage of a resolution calling on the District Commissioners for enforcement of existing laws and regulations affecting public health, comfort, and safety in connection with rented property, and directing the Commissioners further to obtain through the District assessor and submit to the Senate annual reports affecting rentals and values of apartment houses.

"D. The enactment of a bill to require the furnishing of heat in living quarters in the District of Columbia.

"E. Passage of a resolution calling on the District Commissioners for a study of fire- and title-insurance rates and practices in the District of Columbia, with particular reference to the fixing of such rates and elimination of competition."

All of this is new legislation. I have asked the corporation counsel, Mr. Bride, who is much in sympathy with this movement for fair rentals, to study the report and to draft these bills as soon as he can do so. The exception to this procedure is the bill to require that heat be furnished in rented quarters.

I have the draft of that bill in my office. It was sent me, on my request, by the health officer, Dr. Fowler, who tried on numerous occasions in the past to have this bill made law.

In his letter transmitting the draft of the bill, Dr. Fowler advised me that its enactment "would result in great benefit to persons who occupy quarters in apartment houses and rooming houses in this District and who are forced to depend on the owner, landlord, or other person in charge of such apartments and rooming houses to provide them with adequate heat for their comfort and well-being during the cold seasons of the year."

The rent report went farther than these recommendations, however. It took into consideration bills which had been passed by the Senate and other bills pending before the Senate District Committee. All of these, together with the matters referred to the corporation counsel, constitute a well-rounded and essential legislative program for rent reform and housing development.

Some of these bills have been reintroduced, and others will be.

They include bills to accomplish the following objects:

To provide a period of redemption in foreclosures.

To regulate and license real-estate brokers and agents.

To put teeth in our present weak and ineffective usury law. Interest rates paid by many home owners are outrageous.

To create a housing board for the purpose of assisting in the promotion of low-cost housing by limited-dividend corporations in the District.

Together with this last-named bill it is my intention to recommend the enactment of the bill to allow the Commissioners to convert the present disgraceful alley dwellings to commercial uses.

This must be done without hardship to the poor occupants of alley homes, who are the victims of the most flagrant forms of exploitation. Vice and disease are the principal products of Washington's alleys. Sanitation is practically unknown in these hidden communities. The alleys are almost impossible to police. Washingtonians and Members of Congress who have studied the alley problem decided long ago that these alley homes must go.

The alley bill was not included among the measures recommended in the rent report, the reason being that the committee had reported the bill to the Senate before the rent report was made.

I wish I had time to talk with you about each of these bills in detail, because it is necessary that the public get behind them if we are to get effective action in the near future. But I hope on some other occasion to have an opportunity to talk about each one of these proposals which are, in my opinion, absolutely necessary if we are to have any genuine and lasting relief in the local housing situation.

The need for every one of the bills I have mentioned cannot be successfully denied. The record of the hearings held by our subcommittee during the rent investigation contains evidence that proves the public necessity for reform in the real-estate business and a practical, businesslike adjustment of our housing difficulties.

And now let us talk for a little while about statistics. We have heard a great deal during the past few days about statistics on the cost of living. This has been in connection with the recent Executive order of President Roosevelt in applying the 15 percent reduction to Government salaries on the basis of changes in living costs between June 1928 and December 1932.

President Roosevelt found that the cost of living for the United States during that period had decreased 21.7 percent.

There can be no question, I think, of the fact that food and clothing, particularly, have led the decline in living costs in the District.

I have studied very carefully the pamphlet issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics for December 1932, entitled "Retail Prices and Cost of Living." It was from the data furnished by this publication, largely, that the President arrived at his conclusions as to decreases in living costs.

Now, the Bureau of Labor Statistics tries to present its data in the clearest possible form, so that it may be widely understood and used. However, it is not always easy to get behind the statistics and tell just what they mean.

When the Bureau furnished our subcommittee with a fine and very valuable report on Washington rents during the course of our investigation they urged that care be used in quoting comparisons of the statistics for different periods and for different cities, because of the ease with which errors can be made when dealing with statistics.

However, I think I am on pretty safe ground when I draw a few inferences from the statistics in the Bureau's December bulletin.

As you doubtless know, a great part of the Bureau's figures are offered in the form of index numbers, while others are expressed in terms of percentages.

The report carries a table of index numbers showing changes in the costs of food, clothing, rent, etc., in the United States from 1913 to 1932. Another table shows the changes in the costs of these commodities in 19 cities, of which Washington is one, between 1914 and 1932; but these changes are expressed in terms of percentages of increase over December 1914. So it is pretty difficult to arrive at an accurate and usable comparison between the local figures and the national statistics.

We do find on examining the report, so far as Washington rents are concerned, that between June 1928 and December 1932 they dropped from 32.7 percent above the 1914 level to 22.5 percent above 1914, a reduction in 4½ years of 10.2 percent. According to the Bureau's figures, rents in Washington were higher in 1928 than in any other period.

They began a very gradual decline after 1928—a point or a fraction thereof each 6 months—until June 1932, when the rent investigation was begun. I think the Federal pay cut and the effect of our inquiry combined to bring about the first real drop in the Bureau's figures on Washington rents. In June of last year the percentage was 27.1 over 1914. In December the percentage had dropped to 22.5.

We have seen that Washington rents declined 10.2 percent in the 4¼ years between June 1928 and December 1932.

Let us see what this Government Bureau's report says about other cities for the same period. You will find that it is as true today as when I first stated it last June that rents in the District have not experienced the same deflation as have rents in the other cities.

Betwen 1928 and 1932, according to the report of the Bureau, rents in Baltimore, our neighboring Maryland city, dropped 28.8 percent against Washington's 10.2 percent; in Norfolk, Va., rents went down 33.5 percent against Washington's 10.2; Boston, 24.1 percent; Cleveland, 43.6 percent; New York, 25.2 percent; Philadelphia, 31.4 percent; Detroit led the list with a decline of 78 percent in rents. And yet Washington has had only 10 percent reduction.

Washington was lowest on this entire list of 19 cities. This should be conclusive evidence that the rents in the Nation's Capital are not responsive to the conditions which forced rents down in every other city. While rents have been reduced, I say they have not been reduced enough.

Of course I expect to be told, as I was during the rent inquiry, that rents in the District did not go as high as they did in other cities in the years immediately following the war. Now that may be the case. But you will remember, many of you, that rent profiteering in the District became so dangerous to the public welfare that Congress stepped in and established a rent commission to protect tenants.

Also, when we compare the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for different cities we should not forget that the percentages expressed there are, in each case, related only to the average rent charged workingmen in any one city in 1914.

I mean by that that all of these figures have significance only as they apply to the average rent charged in a city in 1914. For instance, the 1914 rent in Washington may have been $40. In Baltimore it may have been $30. In some other city it may have been $25. The average rent in Washington is a high rent compared with that in other cities. In 1914 that was true, and it is today.

So when changes in rents are expressed in percentages it is quite possible that a city with a $40 average rental in 1914 and a $60 average today will show the same percentage of increase as a city with a $15 average in 1914 and a $22.50 average today, because in both cities the present rents are 50 percent above 1914.

However, there is a lot of difference between a $60 rent and one of $22.50, even though both are shown to be no more than 50 percent higher today than they were in their respective cities in 1914.

That is why I feel very strongly that the President should look beyond index figures and percentages in studying the cost of living to Government employees in Washington. Everybody knows that Washington has higher living costs than many other cities.

I believe that we shall know just how much it costs to live in Washington, as compared with other communities, by getting down to a dollars-and-cents basis in our computations.

By this statement I want you to know that I do not disparage the extremely valuable work of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Nor do I criticize the method by which the President reached his conclusions as to the decrease in the cost of living.

I am supporting President Roosevelt, though a Republican. I think President Roosevelt wants to be fair to all Government workers. But I think he should know exactly what the conditions are concerning Washington rents, and I intend to see that he does know them.

I intend to go to President Roosevelt myself and put before him all the facts in the Washington rental situation. I think I can convince him that rents in the Capital are outrageously high. I am going to ask him to support the legislative program for housing reform that I have outlined to you tonight, or some other program, and help us bring down these rents as quickly as possible.

The President should know, also, that many Washingtonians consider the present conditions serious enough to warrant the reestablishment of the rent commission in the District.

As I have said before, that commission was instrumental in preventing a great deal of profiteering at a time when the District was crowded with war workers and was feeling the effects of an acute shortage in housing.

Today the situation is different. There is no shortage in housing here, except as regards the low-cost types of housing. There is a large percentage of vacancy in apartments and in houses of the larger type.

Our rent subcommittee gave considerable thought to the proposal that the rent commission be again set up to safeguard tenants from extortionate charges. We called into conference Mr. Keech, the people's counsel, and Mr. William A. Roberts, the special assistant corporation counsel, both of whom have the public interest at heart. It was their opinion that legislation at this time providing for a rent commission would be unconstitutional because of the absence of the sort of emergency under which the commission first came into being.

However, I have not discarded the idea. If it is necessary to put a rent commission to work—and such a commission is a fairly expensive piece of governmental machinery—I think it should be done, unless our object of lowering rents and providing other reforms can be accomplished in a better way. The weight of legal opinion at this time—and I am not a lawyer—seems to incline to the kind of legislation that I have mentioned in my talk with you this evening, and I certainly think we should give this progressive plan of regulating housing a fair trial, keeping in mind always the possibility that, if other plans fail, we should resort to relief through a rent commission. I know this: The United States Senate is in full sympathy with this movement—fair rental charges.

Let me mention here just one other matter that I have spoken of earlier in my talk. Among the recommendations of the rent subcommittee was the passage of a resolution to give the Commissioners authority to study fire and title insurance rates and practices.

It seems strange to me that we should have so many complaints of high rates on fire insurance when the fire loss in the District is one of the lowest in the United States. I believe the home owners are paying too much for their insurance. I am reliably informed that only a very small fraction of the amount paid out in fire insurance in Washington is returned in the form of settlements.

The Commissioners should have ample authority to examine fire-insurance rates and to compare them with those charged in other cities. They also should be given the power to look into the rates charged by the title-insurance companies here and to report whether the existing procedure in the District is the best that may be obtained for the benefit of the people.

Let us bear one important fact in mind when we leave here tonight:

Rent in Washington is no sacred white cow. I certainly have no thought of delaying action any longer to see whether eventually rents in this city will come down to more sensible levels.

Tenants who are still paying rents based on fictitious, watered, and inflated values of rental property in this city are doing so with great difficulty. They cannot be expected to continue to keep on paying the same old high rents after their pay has been reduced.

Remember, also, that the owners of rental property in Washington are not all rolling in wealth. Some of them have met this situation fairly. They have reduced rents and have been lenient with tenants who have been temporarily without employment. Many landlords paid high prices for the property they bought. Now, with rents on the down grade, they are not making as much money as they did a few years ago. But I cannot get excited about that. None of us are as well off financially as we were before the depression overtook us.

The honest landlord need fear nothing from the legislation that is soon to be offered. But the owner or agent who is determined to get all he can, and to evade rent reductions, is heading for a lot of trouble. If he is blind to everything except profit now, I confidently predict that his field of vision will be widened considerably in the immediate future.

LAWS AND REGULATIONS AFFECTING VETERANS' COMPENSATION

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, a great many inquiries are being received by Members of the Senate and the House with reference to the meaning of the new veterans' law and the Presidential regulations. Mr. Thomas Kirby, chairman of the national legislative committee of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, has prepared a digest of the law, and, because of the fact that its various provisions are summarized and the digest is in easily understandable English, I think perhaps it ought to be incorporated in the RECORD, and I ask that that may be done.

There being no objection, the digest was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS,
Washington, D.C., April 3, 1933.

BULLETIN ON NEW UNITED STATES RELIEF POLICY FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS (ACT MAR. 20 AND PRESIDENT'S REGULATIONS APR. 1, 1933)

All present payments will cease on July 1 next except on claims of widows and orphans which must be reviewed to establish whether eligible under new 1-year presumption.

"Compensation" and "disability allowance" are terms not in the act of March 20, as the whole system of direct financial relief is classified as "pension."

There is a rebuttable presumption of soundness at enlistment, but such veteran must have served 90 days in the military service.

There is 1 year's presumption for service connection of chronic diseases provided the veteran served 90 days.

Misconduct cases are generally excluded from pensions but permitted hospitalization under certain conditions.

Compensation will be paid where a preexisting disease was aggravated unless there is a specific finding that the increase in disability was due to the natural progress of the disease.

Where the service connection is granted the payment of pension will be as follows: 10 percent, $8; 25 percent, $20; 50 percent, $40; 75 percent, $60; P.T., $80; with an additional allowance of $20 per month for the anatomical loss of 1 foot, 1 hand, or 1 eye.

Where there is a loss of 2 limbs or the veteran is so helpless as to be in need of an attendant the pension shall be $100. Where there is a loss of 2 hands and 1 foot, or 2 feet and 1 hand, the monthly pension shall be $150. For blindness in both eyes, with only light perception, $175 per month. For blindness in both eyes, only light perception; loss of 1 hand or 1 foot, $200 per month. For the loss of both feet or both hands and is blind in both eyes, $250 per month.

The rate of death pension to dependents of service-connected veterans is unchanged.

There is a payment of $20 per month on non-service-connected veterans who served 90 days or more and who are permanently and totally disabled. Enlistment for this class must have been between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and those are not eligible if they paid income tax preceding year.

No retroactive payments will be made prior to the date of filing claim.

Dependency compensation to children will terminate at 16 years of age unless the child is totally incapacitated for self-support.

No dependency payments will be made to father or mother where the dependency arises 10 years after the death of the veteran.

Application on appeals must be made within 6 months after initial adverse action. Where a case is denied in part appeal must be made within 60 days.

All ratings will be based on average impairment of earning capacity resulting from similar injuries in civil occupation.

Emergency officers now on retired list will be retained providing they served between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and that such service was the "causative factor" of the present disability.

Hospital treatment will be granted for service-connected disabilities.

Destitute persons who served 90 days and are suffering from permanent and total disabilities of tuberculosis, NP, and ailments which wholly incapacitate them will be hospitalized.

Clothing will be furnished to veterans hospitalized only where they are indigent and clothing is necessary to protect health and sanitation.

Transportation may be furnished to and from hospitals for service-connected disability, but to no other classes.

Where a veteran dies in a hospital of a service-connected disability payment for transportation of the body to a national cemetery or the veteran's home may be paid in the discretion of the adminstration.

No veteran shall receive domiciliary or medical care who resides outside of the United States.

The maximum amount payable to a man without dependents receiving institutional care is $15 per month.

The Administrator is authorized to apportion pensions to dependents.

The Administrator may furnish orthopedic appliances to veterans suffering service-connected disabilities.

Where a veteran is receiving yearly renewable term insurance payments and the award is terminated the insured shall be entitled to convert the amount of to any other form of Government insurance. The insured has 30 days in which to make this conversion after notice of his right.

No claim for yearly renewable term insurance will be considered except where payments are now being made or where suit was filed prior to March 20, 1933.

Payment, not to exceed $75, for funeral expenses of honorably discharged veterans is allowed except where the veteran's net assets exceed $75.

Claims for reimbursement of burial allowance must be made within 1 year.

The World War is considered as beginning April 6, 1917, and ending November 11, 1918, except for those serving in Russia, in which case April 1, 1920, is the closing date.

The term "wife" or "widow" of a World War veteran is a person who was married to the veteran prior to July 3, 1931.

Where the injury or disease occurred while on leave, the burden of proof shall be on the claimant to show that it was in line of duty. Where the disability occurred while at camp or post, the burden shall be upon the Government to show the disability was not in line of duty.

No person holding position under the United States Government or the District of Columbia shall be paid a pension or retirement while in such employment, except where the pay is for disability actually incurred in combat. Persons so employed will receive $6 per month for directly service-connected disabilities.

Where a person receiving pension or retirement pay resides outside of the continental limits of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, Hawaii, and the Panama Canal Zone, he shall not receive more than 50 percent of the amount otherwise due.

The veteran may grant Disabled American Veterans or other recognized service organization written power of attorney to act as his representative to present his claim, but only one such authorization will be allowed in each case.

No person receiving monetary benefits from the Administration will be permitted to sit on a rating board to determine the rights of another person to receive such benefits. Indications are that adjudicators and authorizers will also be barred.

The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may enter into a contract in emergency cases for hospitalization of veterans suffering with service-connected disabilities.

All information concerning a veteran and his claim shall be deemed confidential, except the President is authorized, at his discretion, to make public information concerning actual beneficiaries.

While attorneys may represent veterans in claims before the Administration, these lawyers will be barred from inspection of files and drastically limited as to fees, expenses, and other financial allowances.

All but a few of the larger Veterans' Administration offices in the field will be gradually closed before July 1, 1934, and practically all activities, except hospitals and homes, will be centralized in Washington.

Present plans call for indefinite continuance of diagnostic centers at Washington, Chicago, and San Francisco.

All intermediary boards of appeal have been discontinued and the only appeal will be from a regional office on final action at Washington.

It is planned to abandon all beds outside of Veterans' Administration facilities as fast as feasible.

All statements as to retention, transfer, or surplusing of Administration personnel are at present purely speculative, although it is expected that thousands of present employees will be disposed of within the next 6 months.

All World War awards—compensation, disability allowances, insurance, retirement, and dependency—will be reviewed as fast as practicable and the new law applied.

Indications are that the $50 award for arrested tuberculosis will be continued for 5 years after arrest, $25 for second 5 years after arrest, and then dropped from the rolls unless there is a reactivation, when same plan will be repeated.

Men in hospitals for service-connected disabilities will not be automatically rated total while in hospital, but will be paid for actual degree of disability.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I am offering an amendment providing for the striking out, on page 2, lines 5 and 6, of this bill, of the word "cannery."

The canning industry, while it is seasonal, yet it is one of the most important industries of my State. It hardly seems possible that the author of the bill or the Committee on the Judiciary, which reported it, could have realized the serious blow it was dealing this industry when it included canneries in the enumeration of producing organizations to be affected by its provisions.

I note in the report submitted by the committee that this is a bill intended "to revive languishing interstate commerce in the products of mines, factories, and manufacturing establishments throughout the Nation." What a mistaken thought that is, insofar as the canning industry is concerned, for the bill, in all probability, if enacted into law with the word "cannery" retained in it, will prove to be the most deadly blow ever struck at the canning industry and at the farmer in the State of Maryland.

As is well known, a very large percentage of farmers of the State are engaged in raising fruits and vegetables for canneries. These fruits and vegetables only ripen once a year, and there is no law which can be passed by Congress that will supersede the immutable law of the universe that guides and directs their ripening. When ripened, products of the farm and orchard must be cared for immediately, or enormous losses will be sustained. Do you think, Mr. President, this can be done by working 5 days per week or 6 hours per day? Far from it. Canning is one of the most intensive, concentrated businesses in the world, for when the fruits and vegetables are ready for canning they must be used immediately, or tremendous losses will ensue. At the very most, no cannery, even though it is canning both fruits and vegetables of a varied character, operates more than 3 or 4 months in a year, and no canning organization or section of the country has sufficient labor available to run in shifts of 5 hours a day in order to care for the products as they are turned in by the farmers, and, consequently, they would be compelled to stand idle part of the time and see their perishable fruits and vegetables rot, as well as having the resultant pack of much lower quality because of unsatisfactory labor conditions.

This same condition would apply to a greater or less extent to the canning of seafood products, which are only prepared for the market at certain seasons of the year. This, too, is an enormous industry in the State of Maryland, and if the word "cannery" should be retained in the bill, this industry would also be dealt a staggering blow from which it would hardly be likely to recover.

In other words, under the guise of reviving industry and reducing unemployment, this bill as it now stands will deal almost a death blow to one of the great industries of the country, and one of the principal industries of the State of Maryland. Surely there is no one of my colleagues who would deliberately vote to do this. The situation is so obvious that it cannot be successfully denied, and I would respectfully ask for the adoption of the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I merely want to ask a question of the Senator from Maryland with reference to the amendment submitted by him. Would the amendment meet the conditions better than an amendment which provided that the Department of Labor, or some other authority, should have the right and power, at stated times and under certain conditions, to vary the terms of the bill?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Replying to the inquiry of the Senator, I must say that I prefer to have the word "cannery" eliminated from the bill, but if that cannot be accomplished, then I think the suggestion submitted by the Senator from Nevada may be the best that can be done.

Mr. McCARRAN. I noticed that in the hearings which were held before the last subcommittee in charge of the bill that very question came up; hence I am asking the question.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I think I have answered the Senator's question.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a statement on the same question which has just been discussed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I say to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the Senator from Maryland that the author of the bill, the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], and myself spent an hour this morning on this particular subject, and, so far as we could, we agreed upon general language which I think will succeed in accomplishing every legitimate objective that we want to reach without actually impinging on any of the necessary and advisable functions of the bill itself. It will be submitted subsequently by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the Senator from Idaho yield that I may ask a question of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Would the Senator from Michigan be kind enough to state what that amendment is?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should prefer to have the amendment textually submitted by the Senator from Washington later, because I do not have a copy of it in my hand.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me in order that I may ask a question of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the amendment which was prepared by the Senators mentioned meet the objections that have been offered to the bill by the canneries? I have heard from a great many of them in my State.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it will, Mr. President. I think I can read to the Senate from the notes in my hand, if the Senator from Idaho will permit, the language upon which we agreed this morning. The first paragraph of the new proviso would read as follows:

> This section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character.

The second paragraph upon which there was agreement—and I am speaking subject to the correction of the able Senator from Alabama all the time—is intended to reach those individual cases in industry which are exceptional or where there may be an occasional expert whose labor has to be continuous, and reads as follows:

> Upon the submission of satisfactory proof of the existence of special conditions in any industry included herein making it necessary for certain persons to work more time than herein provided, the Secretary of Labor may issue an exemption permit in respect to such persons, relieving the commodity from the provisions of this act.

We think that within this language is embraced all of the legitimate exemptions, and yet the Senator from Alabama agrees that we have not invaded the legitimate and desirable objectives of the bill itself.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Apropos of what the Senator from Michigan has just said, I think the amendment would be all right except that it puts the packer of perishable food up against the necessity of getting a permit from a Government bureau here first.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would it be inconvenient to Senators if we should debate this amendment later?

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not know the Senator was planning to discuss that matter further; otherwise I would not have intruded on his time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, at the proper time I am going to move to strike out these words:

> and this act shall remain in force for 2 years after the date it becomes effective.

I shall move to strike out those words for the reason that they are inserted upon the theory that if the bill is treated as an emergency bill it may be regarded as constitutional, whereas if it is treated as permanent legislation a different question is presented. Something in the nature of a supposed emergency is invoked in order to make certain the Court will find it easier to find it constitutional.

From my viewpoint, the most objectionable feature of this bill is that which rests upon the contention that the Congress or the Court, or the Congress and the Court, may adjudge a bill on a law constitutional upon the theory that an emergency exists, whereas if no emergency exists it would not be regarded as constitutional.

This measure presents one of the most important questions, not only from a constitutional standpoint but from a humanitarian standpoint, that has been presented of late in this body. It presents the question of how far the Court will go in the future in permitting the Congress to exclude from interstate commerce any commodity which the Congress in its wisdom may see fit to exclude. Secondly, it involves the humanitarian and social question of limiting the days of work per week. The former question presents a constitutional problem which has been before the courts from time to time since the Government was organized and has never yet been clearly and definitely and finally settled as to the question presented by this measure. Lawyers have divided and courts have given us decisions with powerful opinions on both sides of the question. The latter problem is one of social justice, becoming more urgent with our industrial growth and development.

I suspect that the Senate almost as a body is in harmony with the view which has been expressed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] that there should be a limitation in some respects of the days per week which people should be required to labor; but scarcely less important than that is the question of controlling the wage of workers.

There has long been in this country a discussion of the question of the living wage; and I presume it will be conceded that if we may exclude from interstate commerce commodities which have been produced by 6-day-week labor, we may also exclude from interstate commerce, if that principle is sustained, commodities which have been produced at a wage which we deem to be below a living wage. In other words, if we can exclude a commodity because we think that the 5-day week should alone be utilized in producing a commodity, we can also exclude a commodity if we think the wage is too low. I mention this to indicate the wide sweep of the problem before us.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator made the statement that it will be conceded that if we had the power to prohibit the shipment of goods in interstate commerce by reason of the hours of labor, we would also have the power to prohibit the shipment of goods in interstate commerce if a minimum wage should not be adopted. Under my conception of the effect of the commerce clause if the minority opinion of the Supreme Court in the Dagenhart case should be adopted, that is correct. However, a line of distinction has been drawn by the Supreme Court which would permit upholding a statute with reference to hours of labor which would not permit upholding a similar statute with reference to a minimum wage.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think an analysis of those decisions will sustain the contention of the Senator from Alabama. I do not believe that distinction has really entered into those decisions to the extent that we may consider it settled. The arguments which would limit the days per week would limit the hours per day and the wage paid. Constitutionally, and as a matter of social well-being, we cannot stop with this first step. Logically, we must, in time, move on.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will permit me, I simply wanted it clearly understood that while in my judgment, if the minority opinion should be adopted, Congress would have the right to prescribe a minimum wage, yet, proceeding in line with certain opinions of the Supreme Court in connection with minimum wages and hours of labor where the Court has drawn a distinction, I desire the Senator to understand that so far as my personal views are concerned that distinction is not justified; but it has been made by the Court.

Mr. BORAH. I know it is contended that it has been made; but when we come to consider the different opinions I think it is a very feeble thread upon which to hang legislation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will yield just for an observation, there are many grounds upon which the Court can sustain a limitation of hours where they cannot sustain a wage schedule. For instance, certainly preventing an unwholesome surplus from accumulating and burdening the markets of interstate commerce is a ground that would not be in existence on the wage-scale matter.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I take it that the Supreme Court of the United States are not wholly governed nor wholly controlled by the question of dollars and cents or the material side of it, but that humanitarian principles, the employment of people at a living wage, would be as controlling and conclusive with them in considering the whole question of social justice and the entire question of the permanency of our institutions as would be the question of whether or not there was a surplus on hand.

Mr. President, the first question which I ask the Senate for a few moments to consider is this dangerous and indefensible doctrine of an emergency. It seems to be supposed that through and by means of what is called an emergency we may in some way secure a different constitutional construction than would prevail if the emergency were not appealed to. It seems to be believed in some quarters that the word " emergency " may evoke all kinds of constitutional powers.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] stated the whole matter yesterday, to my mind, in a single paragraph:

> I wish to make clear at this juncture that it is my thought that the justification for this legislation must be found within the Constitution rather than outside the Constitution. I do not believe that Congress has the power, or that the judiciary has the power, to set aside the Constitution for one hour, and I think that any case or any legislation that is rested on that basis will in the end prove subversive.

I agree entirely with the statement of the Senator that it is not within the power of Congress or the power of the courts, or the power of the courts and of Congress, or any other power except the amendatory power of the people of the United States, to change the Constitution of the United States. It cannot be changed by suspension. It cannot be changed by construction, if that construction is based upon anything but a fair interpretation of the language found in the Constitution. I should like therefore to eliminate from this bill the implied recognition of the proposition that by inserting a clause which makes it an emergency measure we will get from the Supreme Court of the United States a different construction than we would if it were not there. The proposition is wholly untenable, and I do not want expressly or impliedly to see it recognized by the Congress.

I refer to a case which, to my mind, has never been modified, much less reversed or in anywise emasculated in its purport by the Supreme Court of the United States. I refer to Ex parte Milligan (4 Wall. 2).

It should be borne in mind that this case came up at the close of the great Civil War. The Court was construing a law which arose out of and was enacted during the Civil War. It was supposed to be connected with the successful prosecution of the war. It had had the approval of the President of the United States. When it reached the Supreme Court the Supreme Court had this to say in the single paragraph which I shall read—page 120:

> Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors; for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than 70 years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government.

Mr. President, upon no other theory can a constitutional government exist. A constitutional government such as we have is the expression of the will of the people crystallized into the Constitution; and no power can change it or suspend it except the power which makes it, and that is the people of the United States. It is the difference between a government of law and a government of men; between that of a republic, a democracy, and that of a dictatorship.

Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence.

No power exists anywhere, in the Congress or in the courts or in any body which Congress can create, to change the Constitution, either by suspension or otherwise—as the Senator from Arkansas said, not for 1 hour. If for 1 hour, it could be for 1 year or 10 years. If for a day, it might be for 4 years, as in Germany where all constitutional government, all forms of a republic, has been made to give way to a dictatorship.

It has been supposed that the decision of the Court has been modified. I do not so understand. The case which is relied upon as indicating a modification of the case of Ex parte Milligan is the case of Wilson v. New (243 U.S. 332).

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think the Senator is referring to the argument I made as making reference to any modification of the Milligan case. I did not intend so to state. What I said was, if the Senator will read my remarks, that the majority opinion in the case took the position that legislation might be enacted to meet a temporary emergency for the period of the emergency, while the minority insisted that the majority were sustaining legislation on the emergency theory, which legislation violated the Constitution.

I have read the RECORD this morning, and I see that at one place the statement is left out that the minority had made that statement; but my entire argument was based on the fact, not that I claimed that the Milligan case had been changed, but that emergency conditions, according to these four opinions, justified emergency legislation during that time, which, according to the statement of the justice writing the opinion, might not be justified permanently. I agree with the Senator, and I do not think the Milligan case has been modified at all. I did not intend to leave that impression.

Mr. BORAH. I misunderstood the able Senator from Alabama, and I am glad to have his view permanently incorporated in the RECORD to the effect that there is no power anywhere, at any time, under any circumstances, whatever they may be called—emergency or otherwise—to suspend the Constitution of the United States. Insofar as we may, let us discard, disown, and denounce that un-American theory.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator fully. Of course, during war time there are certain powers given to the Congress——

Mr. BORAH. They are war powers.

Mr. BLACK. But they are war powers within the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. BLACK. And I thoroughly agree with the Milligan case. There is no question on my part about that being sound law, and just law, and law that is necessary to the perpetuity of the Republic.

Mr. BORAH. Then, Mr. President, there is no occasion for putting into this bill a provision which undertakes to make it an emergency matter, and I should like to see that taken out.

Before I leave that, however, I am satisfied that the impression is entertained, whether by the Senator from Alabama or not—and I assume it is not, because he has so stated—there is an impression entertained that by some method, under certain circumstances, the Court will put a construction upon the Constitution to meet an emergency that it would not put upon the Constitution if the emergency did not exist; in other words, that an emergency grants powers, as it were. That proposition I controvert. I not only controvert it but I denounce it.

I desire to call attention to the case of Wilson against New. This is the case upon which so much stress is laid, and to which the able Senator from Alabama referred yesterday. I read from page 346:

That common carriers by rail in interstate commerce are within the legislative power of Congress to regulate commerce is not subject to dispute. It is equally certain that where a particular subject is within such authority the extent of regulation depends on the nature and character of the subject and what is appropriate to its regulation.

Here was a case in which the competency of Congress to deal with the subject was not questioned. It was a subject matter with which Congress undoubtedly had power to deal—to wit, the control of the railroads, the instrumentalities of interstate commerce—and the Court stressed the fact that as Congress was dealing with a subject which was unquestionably within its competency, the extent to which Congress would go in dealing with it was for the judgment of Congress; but in no sense could an emergency give to the Congress any power that it did not find within the Constitution—a wholly different proposition from what is proposed here.

The powers possessed by Government to deal with a subject are neither inordinately enlarged or greatly dwarfed because the power to regulate interstate commerce applies. This is illustrated by the difference between the much greater power of regulation which may be exerted as to liquor and that which may be exercised as to flour, dry goods, and other commodities. It is shown by the settled doctrine sustaining the right by regulation absolutely to prohibit lottery tickets and by the obvious consideration that such right to prohibit could not be applied to pig iron, steel rails, or most of the vast body of commodities.

That is what is proposed to be done here.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree with what the Senator is saying, and I think the pending bill is unconstitutional, in the light of the decisions which have been rendered by the Supreme Court; but I would like to ask the Senator this question: The States, before the Constitution was adopted, undoubtedly had a right to regulate or prohibit the importation of goods from other States. The power the States had was either retained by the States or conferred upon the Federal Government. The Supreme Court has held that there are certain articles which are deleterious to public health, morals, or the general welfare, which may be prohibited from entering into interstate commerce. They have also held that where the goods are articles such as the pig iron, mentioned here, their shipment cannot be prohibited. I would like to know what became of the power that was originally invested in the States when the Constitution was adopted. No power was lost. It must have gone somewhere, either into the Federal Government or into the States. We know it is not in the States; so what became of that power to prohibit the importation of goods into States when the Constitution was adopted?

Mr. BORAH. There is no power lost. All power is found either in the States or the National Government.

Mr. LOGAN. When they were independent colonies?

Mr. BORAH. The power which as separate sovereignties they exercised in excluding foreign goods the National Government now enjoys.

Mr. LOGAN. Did they not prohibit the shipment of goods from Pennsylvania into New York before the Constitution was adopted?

Mr. BORAH. That was in the colonial days, before independence, and when they were not guided by the constitutions of their own States. They were independent sovereignties.

Mr. LOGAN. The point I make is that the States, before they became bound together in a union, or in a compact did have the power to prohibit the importation of goods into the States. All the power the Colonies had, all the power the independent States had, before the Constitution was either retained in the States or it was delegated to the Federal Government. What became of that particular power they had to prohibit the importation of goods?

Mr. BORAH. I think that if the Senator will examine the case of United States against Marigold, in Ninth Howard, he will find a vast amount of support in that decision for his contention, but there the Court was dealing with the shipment of goods from a foreign nation. I think the Court went all the way in saying that it was within the power of Congress to prevent the shipment of goods from a foreign nation into the United States, regardless of whether they were deleterious or not. That would be something like the case which the Senator is speaking of. But there they were dealing with a foreign nation and not dealing with matters between States.

Before we go farther with this matter, I would like to say a further word regarding the matter of the emergency, and then I will take up the question the Senator has been discussing.

I was dealing with the question of whether an emergency would justify a different construction of the Constitution than that which would prevail if an emergency did not exist. The Milligan case was cited, and the case of Wilson against New has often been cited, as holding that Congress may exclude from interstate commerce, regardless of whether it is the case of an emergency or not, goods which otherwise would be admissible. But let me ask Senators to give attention to this paragraph from the case of Wilson against New:

> This must be unless it can be said that the right to so regulate as to save and protect the public interest did not apply to a case where the destruction of the public right was imminent as a result of a dispute between parties and their consequent failure to establish by private agreement a standard of wages which was essential; in other words that the existence of the public right and the public power to preserve it was wholly under the control of the private right to establish a standard by agreement. Nor is it an answer to this view to suggest that the situation was one of emergency, and that emergency cannot be made the source of power. The proposition begs the question, since although an emergency may not call into life a power which has never lived, nevertheless an emergency may afford a reason for the exertion of a living power already enjoyed.

In other words, in this case the Court was doing nothing more than undertaking to determine how far Congress might go in the exertion of a conceded power, but stating explicitly that no emergency could call into existence a power which was not found in the Constitution. To refer again to the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas, it must be found within the Constitution. It cannot be found within an emergency. The emergency cannot call anything into the Constitution which the fathers did not write there.

> If acts which, if done, would interrupt, if not destroy, interstate commerce may be by anticipation legislatively prevented, by the same token the power to regulate may be exercised to guard against the cessation of interstate commerce threatened by a failure of employers and employees to agree as to the standard of wages, such standard being an essential prerequisite to the uninterrupted flow of interstate commerce.

What the Supreme Court approved in that case was that, conceding that the power of Congress existed to deal with the railroads, that competency belonged to Congress; then Congress might proceed to the point of dealing with the wage question in order effectively to regulate a conceded agency of which it had control.

Mr. President, I do not desire to continue the discussion on the question of the power in an emergency to sustain the Constitution of the United States. I had supposed that that doctrine was dead everywhere except in certain foreign countries. It has no place in our theory of government.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the point, the Senator does concede, however, that what would be in the public interest at one time might not be in the public interest at another time, would he not?

Mr. BORAH. I think that is true; that is, the Constitution may be adapted to new conditions. The Constitution is a living ordinance, subject to construction from time to time, in the light of developing facts. In other words, that instrument may be construed in the light of new conditions, not by writing something into the Constitution but adopting its tactics to new developments.

Mr. LONG. All that I concede and all that I assert. Now I want to ask the Senator one more question. Suppose it developed that, with the capacities which we now have to handle commerce, a 10-hour day was resulting in the production of 15 times as much goods as the railroads could haul. Would it not be within the power of Congress, the only authority that has jurisdiction over interstate commerce, to protect that commerce from being burdened by superfluous crops which were weighing it down to such an extent that it could not be handled?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think so, if I understand correctly the Senator's contention. I think the argument which would be made by the Senator upon that proposition, and the exceedingly able argument made by the Senator from Alabama upon that proposition yesterday, might justify an amendment to the Constitution, but would not justify usurpation of powers by the Congress or the courts.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves the subject of emergencies?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I simply desire to inquire of the Senator what he construes to be meant by the Court in the case of Block against Hirsh, although I do not disagree with his idea about suspending the Constitution, but this sentence appears in that decision:

> A limit in time, to tide over a passing trouble, well may justify a law that could not be upheld as a permanent change.

Mr. BORAH. That is in effect what they held in the case of Wilson against New, that owing to the fact that the railroads were unable to agree with their employees as to a standard wage, Congress, having jurisdiction of the railroads, that being within their competency without doubt, in order to maintain the instrumentalities of commerce and to maintain interstate commerce, which was within their competency, might for a time deal with the question of wages in order to keep the instrumentalities of commerce moving, and to my mind they undertook to do so in the light of the Constitution, and not in defiance of it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator this question? The sentence I read was this:

> A limit in time, to tide over a passing trouble, well may justify a law that could not be upheld as a permanent change.

Does the Senator agree with that?

Mr. BORAH. It might justify it as a matter of ordinary legislation, but it could not justify it if it had to depend upon calling from the Constitution some power which was not provided in the Constitution.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator fully on that, but there are conditions, then, as stated by the Court, where a law can be justified to tide over a passing trouble, as was in this case limited to 2 years, while it could not be upheld as a permanent change.

Mr. BORAH. No; they did not say "upheld." They thought the wisdom of the law was not questioned.

Mr. BLACK. They used the word "upheld."

Mr. BORAH. Exactly, but they thought the wisdom of the law as a law was justified, but that no one assumed that that justification arose out of a different construction of the Constitution than that which would have existed had it been a permanent law.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator there, but they said:

> The regulation is put and justified only as a temporary measure. A limit in time, to tide over a passing trouble, well may justify a law that could not be upheld as a permanent change.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The case of Block v. Hirsh (256 U.S. 135), to which reference has been made apparently as justifying the contention that the Constitution varies with emergencies, is a case which involved the power of Congress to empower a rent commission to determine fair and reasonable rental charges in the District of Columbia. Unquestionably the Congress had all the power to pass that act that a State legislature would have to deal with the same subject as affecting rents in a State.

Every decision, like every statute, must be construed in the light of the subject matter with which it deals, and the conditions sought to be dealt with. The Supreme Court, in the case of Block against Hirsh, said, among other things:

> But a declaration by a legislature concerning public conditions that by necessity and duty it must know, is entitled at least to great respect. In this instance Congress stated a publicly notorious and almost world-wide fact. That the emergency declared by the statute did exist must be assumed, and the question is whether Congress was incompetent to meet it in the way in which it has been met by most of the civilized countries of the world.
> The general proposition to be maintained is that circumstances have clothed the letting of buildings in the District of Columbia with a public interest so great as to justify regulation by law. Plainly, circumstances may so change in time or so differ in space as to clothe with such an interest what at other times or in other places would be a matter of purely private concern.

Then the general doctrine that the law was advanced and enacted as a temporary and emergent measure was asserted. I do not concede that the case of Block against Hirsh rules this bill in any sense. It does not involve the power of Congress to pass a law which under normal conditions is unconstitutional. It does recognize the fact that circumstances may be the guide as to whether the subject matter is affected with such a public interest as to warrant Congress in dealing with it, the assumption being that in ordinary times the subject matter would be regulated by a private contract, but because of the fact that this is the Capital, that space here is required for governmental agencies, that the regulation of the use of space in the National Capital involves the public interest, it was held that, owing to the conditions which existed at that time, there was an emergency which justified the exercise of the legislative power in regulating rentals.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand that case, and as construed by the Senator from Arkansas, it was really applying the principle of the old Granger cases, where the Supreme Court undertook for the first time to determine whether public elevators were affected with a public interest, and were therefore subject to control; they were applying that principle to the rental of buildings in the District of Columbia. I think that is a different proposition entirely from what we have here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is my thought, that the case is really not applicable to this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let us discuss for a few moments, and only a few moments, the bill as a matter of permanent legislation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I have waited for the eminent Senator from Idaho to reach the point where I could put to him an interrogatory I know will be responded to in clarity, whatever may be the Senator's conclusion. I ask the Senator from Idaho what particular provision of the Constitution the Senator feels would be violated by the measure proposed by the Senator from Alabama. That I am very much interested in.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean as a permanent law, free from the doctrine of emergency?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; what particular feature or provision of the Constitution of the United States does the Senator from Idaho urge would be violated by this measure, or what provision would this measure run counter to by which it may be held as being unconstitutional? I call for the Senator's judgment.

Mr. BORAH. I am coming to that question, and I will discuss it. As I understand the able Senator, he asks what provision of the Constitution would be contravened by this proposed law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question just there?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. REED. When the Senator answers, will he not also answer this question: What provision in the Constitution authorizes Congress to enact such a law?

Mr. BORAH. It is one and the same question really.

Mr. REED. No; the Senator from Illinois is asking for the prohibition; I am asking where our power comes from.

Mr. BORAH. The prohibition arises out of the fact that Congress has no powers except such as are delegated to it by the Constitution; so that if the power is not found in the Constitution Congress cannot exercise it. In other words, that which is not granted by the Constitution is prohibited, because the Federal Government is one of delegated powers. I am coming to that question now.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I will not further interrupt the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, whether the Congress of the United States has the competence to exclude from interstate commerce any commodities which in its wisdom it thinks ought to be excluded for any reason is a question which is squarely and fairly presented by this bill, and Senators will all agree, I think, that that is about as important a question as could possibly be presented as a constitutional question and with reference to the interstate-commerce clause. The Court has never yet held that the Congress had power to exclude ordinary commodities from interstate commerce. It has held, by a divided Court, that it is not within the power of Congress to exclude from interstate commerce commodities which were not in some way hurtful, harmful, deleterious, or injurious to the public.

I would say in answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and in answer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] that if we do not find within the Constitution authority for excluding from interstate commerce commodities which are void of injury or are not hurtful to communities, then when we seek to exclude such commodities we are acting without authority of the Constitution. In other words, if Congress is not authorized, so far as the validity of a law is concerned, it is quite as invalid as if it does that which is prohibited. I think the Senator from Illinois will agree with me as to that.

Mr. LEWIS. I may say that I am deeply interested in any legal proposition urged by the Senator from Idaho, for no one in this body is more familiar with his splendid achievements at the bar than myself; but I belong to the other school of thought. I think the time has come stoutly to insist that, instead of asking that we first read in the Constitution authority to do an act, until it can be pointed out that in the Constitution the act is forbidden the right is within the people to execute the act whenever it is found necessary for the welfare of the Nation.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator, then, he takes the position that the Government of the United States is not a government of delegated powers but a government which may exercise any power that is not prohibited?

Mr. LEWIS. Such is my position when it comes to that which professedly is in the service of the people themselves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, it has been universally held unless the power is found in the Constitution—delegated to the National Government—that the National Government cannot exercise that power. In other words, the National Government is one of delegated powers and can enjoy no powers other than those expressly delegated or such powers as may be implied from the delegated powers. Such has been and is the view I entertain.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. The tenth amendment to the Constitution expressly provides that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution * * * are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. In connection with that thought, may I point out that in the Child Labor case—I have not the opinion before me and am speaking entirely from memory—the Supreme Court held that it was necessary to find some authority in the Constitution in order to enact that kind of legislation. Congress undertook to rest that legislation upon the taxing power mentioned in the Constitution, but the Supreme Court said: You are not raising revenue by this act; you are exercising a police power belonging to the State; and, therefore, we hold the act to be unconstitutional, although you claim to base it upon the taxing power contained in the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me say that if the emergency feature is stricken from this bill, I myself shall not be averse to seeing this proposed law go to the Supreme Court of the United States, because I think it is an open question in the Supreme Court of the United States as to the power which Congress has to exclude from interstate commerce ordinary commodities. I say this for the reason that the Child Labor case was decided by a 5-to-4 decision. Five judges held that it was not within the power of Congress to exclude commodities from interstate commerce unless they were hurtful and harmful in some way to the community. Four judges seemed to hold, as I construe the opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes, that it was within the competency of Congress to exclude from interstate commerce any commodities which it, in its wisdom, thought ought to be excluded. So we really have, Mr. President, a constitutional construction resting upon a 5-to-4 decision.

Mr. LOGAN rose.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment—and a 5-to-4 decision, so far as a legislator is concerned, is an unsatisfactory guide. It settles the controversy between the litigants; it establishes the law as to those who are in court; but in determining the wisdom of a bill or as governing Congress in discharging its duty in legislating, a 5-to-4 decision is a very poor guide for the legislator. I have never been willing as a legislator to surrender my views on a constitutional question on the strength of a 5-to-4 decision. That, in my opinion, is no unsound principle. We as legislators must construe the Constitution, and it has never seemed to me I should yield my construction to a decision of that nature.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask if it is the Senator's opinion that if the decision in the Child Labor case is adhered to, then, it necessarily follows that this bill, if it should be enacted into law, would be unconstitutional?

Mr. BORAH. If the decisions of the Court are accepted as they now stand undoubtedly, in my opinion, this proposed law would be unconstitutional.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, it is the Senator's view that there can be no great harm in again putting the question before the Supreme Court, since the former decision depended upon the will of merely one judge? If one judge had voted with the minority, then that would have become the majority opinion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, some years ago I advocated in this Chamber a resubmission of the income tax law prior to the amendment of the Constitution providing for an income tax. I advocated it for the reason that the decision against the original law was a 5-to-4 decision, which, I then thought, was not a satisfactory conclusion when it came to matters of legislation. I was of the opinion that no harm would result by resubmitting the law to the Supreme Court of the United States, and, as I feel now, I am not at all averse to seeing this matter resubmitted to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senator from Alabama has so framed the bill that when it reaches the Supreme Court in the form of a law, as, no doubt, it will, the Supreme Court will be called upon to decide whether or not Congress is to be the judge as to the commodities which shall enter the channels of interstate trade. It is a tremendously important question, because if it is within the competency of Congress to determine that for itself, the power which Congress may exert in many directions through the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution is almost beyond the power of language to describe; and in view of the fact that the Court has never settled this question except by a closely divided Court, as I say, I am not averse to seeing it go to the Supreme Court again, but I should like to have it go as permanent legislation so that the question may be squarely met and the issue finally determined.

Again may I say to the Senator from Alabama that a 2-year law means very little in the cause of humanity; a 2-year law means very little in settling a great social problem, and, if we are going to serve the cause in which we are interested, let us present it to the Court in a way that it will be met and determined once and for all.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. While it is my judgment, contrary to that of the Senator from Idaho, that this bill could be sustained under the majority opinion, the Senator is aware of the fact that when I first offered the bill it contained no limitation.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Insofar as I am concerned, I want it to be permanent legislation, and if a majority of the Senate sees fit to strike out the limitation, I shall not be unfriendly. As a matter of fact, I do not anticipate that, even with the 2-year limitation, if the bill shall become a law and become effective, that it will end at the expiration of 2 years. I want it to be the permanent policy of this Nation, as I tried to set out yesterday; but, if any advantage is to be obtained in the way of votes in the Senate to pass the bill, or if any advantage is to be obtained in the possible upholding of the proposed statute, then, so far as I am concerned, I would rather have a bill with a 2-year limitation than to have no bill at all. The Senator understands, however, that it is my desire to make this the permanent policy, and I thoroughly agree with his views on that point.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to ask a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I make bold to intrude upon the Senator from Idaho, and it cannot be often repeated that I hesitate to break into upon the continuity of his thought; but may I invite the attention of the Senator from Idaho to recall an argument he made on this floor along the line of the distinction between the rights of the people of a government and the privileges or limitations of the government in imposing provisions of control over the people? May I recall to his mind that in the Senate during the Wilson administration, when we both were offering our best services at a critical time here, the Senator from Idaho read an opinion from the Supreme Court of the United States in the case that now recurs to my mind, as cited by him, of Colorado against Wyoming, in which the Court descants upon the distinction between the privileges that are inherent in the people of the United States and those which are in the Government of the United States in its control or provision of control over the people. Does the Senator now recall that case? I only recall the argument.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know to what point I cited it, but I recall the case. It was a case in which there was a controversy between the State of Colorado and the State of Wyoming with reference to the waters in the respective States, and one of the questions which Justice Brewer discussed was whether the Government of the United States had certain inherent powers aside from the powers which were conferred by the Constitution. Did the Government have certain inherent powers by reason of the fact that it was a Government? If I recall accurately the opinion, it was held that all powers must be derived from the Constitution.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator's memory is accurate, as I recall the circumstances, because at that time I was contending for something that my eminent friend and distinguished leader from Arkansas was in opposition to; that at a time when we were at war the constitutional provisions were more than suspended in their liberal application in order to permit the exercise of discretion on the part of those who were commanding the situation in behalf of the people. I here wish to ask the able Senator from Idaho, Is there not a difference between the powers and privileges that are inherent in the people of the United States for the protection of the people in an emergency, such as we contend now exists, as distinguished from the powers that are vested in the Government of the United States in its attempt to control the people of the United States? Is there not an inherent power on the part of the people of the United States in meeting an emergency to pass a law which in its expression seeks the protection of the people at a time when it is needed or to avoid injury at a time when it is threatened?

Mr. BORAH. I do not believe that there is any power in the people represented by their Congress—and that is the only way they can enact laws—to pass any law that is not authorized by the Constitution. I think that all that is answered, if the Senator will permit me to say so, by the proposition that the people may always change their Constitution. If they wish to give Congress unlimited powers the people may do so. But it was thought that it was wiser to put a restraint on Congress, on the courts, and on all public agents. It seems to me they acted with great wisdom in doing so. They may change their form of government and in that way express their will. They cannot express it except in harmony with the Constitution either as it is or as they see fit to amend it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I say, apropos of what has just been said by the Senator from Illinois, that I have never acquiesced, as a matter of reason, in the argument of the Supreme Court in the Child Labor case. It was my province to have charge of the child labor bill during the time it was considered by the Senate. The subject of its constitutionality was then raised and debated at great length. It was decided adversely to the statute by the Supreme Court, the division being 5 to 4, as I remember. A decision like that, as in the decision in the original Income Tax case, is binding until it is reversed; a statute is binding until it is repealed or modified. The Supreme Court did reverse the principle underlying its original decision in the Income Tax case, and it has equal power to reverse the principle underlying the decision in the Child Labor case.

With respect to the immediate question raised by the Senator from Illinois, I undertake to say that, while there may be confusion in the language employed, there has never been an instance in which the Supreme Court has held that an emergency can call into use or life a power that is nonexistent. The true doctrine is admirably stated in one of the cases cited by the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and reported in Two Hundred and Forty-third United States Reports, page 348, in which this language is found:

> The proposition begs the question, since although an emergency may not call into life a power which has never lived, nevertheless emergency may afford a reason for the assertion of a living power already enjoyed.

When this country engages in war there exist certain powers on the part of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy that may be called into use that would not, and perhaps could not, practically be employed during a time of peace, but every power that this Government possesses, excepting such as inhere in all governments, must be found in the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. As I said a moment ago—and I shall conclude on that—the Child Labor case was decided by the Court 5 to 4. So far as I am concerned, I have never felt under any obligation to run counter to my views as to legislation by reason of a 5-to-4 decision, and, as I said a moment ago, I advocated the resubmission of the income tax law because it was set aside by a 5-to-4 decision. I thought it ought to go again to the Court, so that the Court might finally settle the question; and I shall in this case, if the emergency clause is stricken out in the bill, vote for the bill, realizing that as the decision now stands, if the Court adheres to it, it will be held unconstitutional, but, being re-presented to the Court, it may determine that it is constitutional. It is a matter of such vital moment, both from the point of the power of Congress and from the humanitarian standpoint, that I have no hesitancy in voting my views as I entertain them and let the Court again review the question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I add a statement?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The case cited in the able argument of the Senator from Alabama sustaining some not clearly defined emergency power in the Congress to deal with the subject, in Two Hundred and Fifty-third United States Reports, page 206, merely held that the act known as the "Adamson law" "was not intended to govern the exceptional case of an insolvent railroad operating at a loss under an agreement with its men, which they desired to keep, allowing them less wages than the act prescribed."

It was purely a question of the interpretation of the terms and effect of the act, the constitutionality of the act on other grounds having been sustained. The Court in that case merely held that the act did not apply to the case of an insolvent railroad where the employees of the railroad had agreed with the receiver to work for less than the wages contemplated by the act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the emergency clause is eliminated from this bill, does not that eliminate the fundamental basis upon which the author of the bill bases his argument for the constitutionality of the measure, assuming that as a permanent statute, based on the child-labor decision, the Court would sustain the decision rendered in that case?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; of course; but the Senator from Alabama, in response to a question which I asked him yesterday, stated that he had no doubt of the constitutionality of the act aside from the question of emergency. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is my position, too. I do not say I have no doubt as to what the Supreme Court will do, because if it follows precedent in the Child Labor case and adheres to that precedent it might hold the act unconstitutional; but already instances have been cited where the Supreme Court has changed its rulings in important particulars. The case of the income tax has been cited as one notable instance; and I think that in this case, if afforded the opportunity, it probably would reverse its ruling. Its decision is binding until it is reversed; but the same thing is true of a statute. That is in force until it is repealed.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. Let me cite just one other instance regarding the Supreme Court:

In 1847, I think it was, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a State might exercise the right of precluding commodities being shipped within the State in interstate commerce if the Congress of the United States had not legislated upon the subject. In other words, if Congress had not legislated, then a State could exclude intoxicating liquors from coming within the State.

That was the old Chief Justice Taney decision, and I think a very sound decision; but afterward the Supreme Court reversed its position on that point entirely, and held that if the Congress had not legislated upon the subject it was a clear implication upon the part of Congress that it desired the commerce to remain free and uncontrolled. So I say that these decisions by divided courts furnish very little guide to a man in trying to determine what he should do with reference to legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I recall that a few days ago, in the consideration of the beer bill, the Senator from Idaho took the position that we could not withdraw interstate-commerce privileges arbitrarily from a commodity; that it had to be something that was harmful or deleterious to the people.

I did not agree with that position on that bill, and I have as a rule not agreed with it generally. I voted for the child labor law, and I felt that it was constitutional. Of course, the Supreme Court reversed me. It has a habit of doing that. I did not believe that the provision of the Transportation Act for the recapture of certain income above 6 percent was constitutional, but the Supreme Court held that it was.

Mr. BORAH. The Supreme Court is fallible, when it differs with one.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that. Where the Court has passed on a question of this kind, though, so that we must assume that unless it reverses itself it would follow in the same line in the decision on this bill, I am somewhat confused and troubled about what it is the duty of a Member of Congress to do under those circumstances, even where he is in sympathy with the fundamental principles of the measure under consideration. I have for years felt and said publicly that I thought that industry in this country would ultimately have to come to a 6-hour day or a 5-day week, regardless of any emergency, because if machinery has so eliminated the work of man by hand that permanently a large proportion of our people must be out of work, the only solution of that problem would be to scatter the work that remains among those available to perform it. Yet I realize that probably the passage of this bill cannot be advocated on the ground of benefit to any greater extent, or probably to as great an extent, as we who voted for and advocated the child labor law believed would result from the enactment of that law, not only for adults but for children themselves who were being worked in factories; and I am confronted with a very serious problem as to my own vote here in view of the decision of the Court which conflicts with my general views on the subject.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Georgia rose a minute ago. I will yield first to him, and then I will yield to the Senator from Tennessee. Before I do so, however, I desire to repeat that I have never felt myself bound by a 5-to-4 decision when it comes to legislating. I said the other day in the Liquor case that, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, as the decision now stands, goods could not be arbitrarily excluded from interstate commerce unless they were deleterious or injurious. According to the decisions of the Supreme Court, if they adhere to them, that will be true in this case, in my judgment, and the Court will hold the law unconstitutional if it declines to modify its decisions. I am perfectly willing to have the question resubmitted to the Supreme Court of the United States in view of these divided decisions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the 5-to-4 decision is not the thing that bothers me. It is a perfectly legal and binding decision, just as a law passed by the Senate and the House by a majority of one is just as binding on the people as if it had been passed unanimously. Of course, I realize that the changes may be greater for some new judge to reverse the 5-to-4 decision by getting on the side of the 4, and making it 5 to 4 the other way; but in that case, of course, the same effect would result, except that it would be in the opposite direction. But I have just as much respect for a decision of the Supreme Court whether it is unanimous or whether it is rendered by a majority of 5 to 4, because it is binding; and under our theory of the rule of the majority, I think the Court is just as much justified in having its decisions by a majority of one respected as we would be justified in having the people respect our statutes which are passed by a majority of 1.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course, the only way it can ever be determined whether the Court would change its view on a question is by the passage of another statute under which the question would be raised.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not necessarily. Another lawsuit could be brought under the same statute, and new facts and new arguments could be presented to the Court. It is not necessary to pass a new act and have the same question passed upon again. The parties to the same act could bring——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that would be res adjudicata as between the same parties.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not saying the same parties.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, I do not wish to make any technical argument. What I desire to point out is that when we analyze the Supreme Court decisions, they have not adhered to the doctrine that in order to exclude a commodity from interstate commerce it must be deleterious.

I cite the Lottery cases. Everyone knows that a lottery ticket cannot harm anybody. Tons of them could be carried through the mails, and they would not be any more harmful than letters. It is the after effect, the moral effect of the use of lottery tickets, that is harmful. When we analyze the logic of the Lottery cases, we come right back to the doctrine that the matter may be pursued a little further than the mere question as to whether the commodity to be transported is itself detrimental. We can go farther than that under the Supreme Court decisions.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BORAH. I promised to yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to suggest to the Senator that, in my judgment, before the Supreme Court would sustain this act, if it were passed, it not only would have to reverse itself in the Child Labor case but I think undoubtedly it would have to reverse itself in the Minimum Wage cases and in many other cases. The Child Labor case certainly does not stand alone.

I think the Senator correctly observed in the beginning of his argument that if the length of the week could be regulated and the number of hours worked by those who produced an article in interstate commerce, or which subsequently went into interstate commerce, unquestionably the wage could be regulated; and may I say to the Senator that undoubtedly the price of basic commodities could be regulated, because there can be no commerce if basic commodities are sold below the cost of production through any long period of time. Our commerce would break down. It would disappear.

If the theory on which the bill is framed is sound in law, it seems to me almost futile and useless to be engaging in the exercise of setting up a whole lot of involved machinery for a farm bill. Why not simply say that in the judgment of Congress basic commodities absolutely essential for commerce—intrastate, interstate, and foreign commerce—are below the cost of production, that ultimately all commerce will disappear if that condition continues, and simply fix the price of the basic commodities?

So it seems to me that in principle there can be no reasonable doubt that if this law is sustained we can fix the price of a basic commodity, and we can also fix a minimum wage. I do not think there is any question about it. So, while I should like to see the Supreme Court decide the question that would be raised by the passage of this bill, I am quite confident that in order to decide it favorably to the bill the Supreme Court would have to reach a decision and a conclusion which would upset not alone the Child Labor case but the decision in the Minimum Wage case and in many other like cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment.

The suggestions of the Senator from Georgia suggest the vast possibilities of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. All these questions are coming up to us. All these problems are going to be presented to the Congress either today or tomorrow or the next day; and that is an additional reason why I want the Supreme Court finally to settle what our powers are under the interstate-commerce clause with reference to these matters. If it is to the final judgment of that great tribunal that Congress may not exclude ordinary commodities, we shall either amend the Constitution or we shall content ourselves to accept the judgment of the Court as final.

All these decisions to which the Senator has referred, which the Supreme Court may upset, are 5-to-4 decisions, with one exception, I think; and it must be unsatisfactory to everybody who has to legislate upon the subject to undertake to settle the question because of a 5-to-4 decision.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has very properly said that a 5-to-4 decision is binding upon the litigants. It is the law of the land; but we are here making laws. We are establishing policies. Therefore, following the example of Abraham Lincoln, I have always felt that it is a justifiable position to take that when a proposition seems unsettled, legislators, who make laws and establish policies, ought to have some freedom of judgment in the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will permit me, I do not think all of the cases I had in mind were decided by divided courts or courts divided in that proportion, but most of them were. I very much desire to see precisely what the Senator from Idaho would like to see; but I apprehend that what the Supreme Court will do will be to pass upon each particular case and determine whether or not the provisions of that particular statute are a regulation of commerce.

Mr. BORAH. If the Supreme Court passes upon this bill with this emergency clause stricken out, it will have a case before it which will call for a full review of the interstate clause of the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. I grant that it would be a very sweeping decision.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that I think the amendment that the Senator has offered ought to be adopted so as to let the Supreme Court settle the exact question in controversy. That is particularly true because of the fact that while the Supreme Court ruled one way in the Child Labor cases, it rules exactly the opposite way in the Oleomargarine cases, in the Lottery cases, and in a number of other cases. There was no question of deleterious ingredients involved in the Oleomargarine case. That was a commodity that many people had to use, perfectly fit for human consumption, and in use all the time, and in use now; and yet the Supreme Court upheld the tax on that commodity, oleomargarine, in direct opposition to the principle of constitutional construction it announced in the Child Labor cases.

So that it seems to me, with the Court itself holding one way at one time and another way at another time, it is very appropriate that we should send to the Court the direct question as raised in this bill without the proviso that has been suggested. I hope the proviso will be voted down and that we will submit the direct question.

I have the greatest respect for our Supreme Court. Its members are great lawyers and great judges and great men, but we all know that its decisions in the Child Labor cases do not harmonize with its decisions in other similar cases decided by that Court.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will excuse me just a moment, the Senator from Idaho will recall that we passed a second bill taxing child labor, so as to tax it out of existence. As I recall, that bill was drawn upon the direct authority of an act that had barred phosphorus matches from interstate commerce. The Supreme Court upheld—as I recall, it has been some time ago; not by a divided Court, but upheld absolutely—the phosphorus match law, and yet it held exactly the contrary in the case of the child labor law. So that it seems to me we ought to submit this constitutional question to the Supreme Court again.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. It seems to me the Senator from Idaho has rendered a very distinct service in bringing out an argument on this line. It shows the conflicting opinions about what the law is. No one can read these cases and go through the maze of suggestions without realizing that there is no formula at present in existence by which the law can be determined.

For instance, the Child Labor case to which the Senator refers places emphasis upon the harmfulness of the product, and it has led many people to believe that the product must be harmful in order to be excluded. At the same time the Court has sustained the antimonopoly law; and if a monopoly transports a Bible or transports some baby food in interstate commerce, it can be prohibited. The same thing is true with reference to the game law. The Court in the Dagenhart case emphasized the element of harmfulness, and led many people to believe that the commodity must be harmful in order to be prohibited; but, as I pointed out yesterday, a bird that is shot illegally is no more harmful to the person who eats it than a bird that is shot legally.

The court has done the same thing with reference to the railroad law. If a railroad directly or indirectly engages in any kind of manufacturing enterprise, it is against a Federal law which has been upheld for it to ship the most wholesome product in interstate commerce. It cannot even ship coal in interstate commerce. That shows that when the Supreme Court in the Dagenhart case left the impression that the product had to be harmful, they absolutely ignored their other opinions if it was intended by that case to leave the impression that the commodity itself must be inherently vicious or deleterious.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Justice Holmes, in his dissenting opinion, points that out pretty strongly.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. So it shows the absolute necessity of getting this matter before the court, and, as I see it—and I think the Senator is correct—considering the humanitarian standpoint. If it should be conceded that the Supreme Court would have to overrule the Dagenhart case, at the same time they would be following some of their other cases; but if it be conceded that they would have to overrule it, certainly there is no excuse not to vote for this bill if we believe in the policy of protecting American labor.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 9, after the word "day", the Senator from Washington proposes to insert the following:

Provided, This section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character: Provided further, That upon the submission of satisfactory proof of the existence of special conditions in any other industry included herein, making it necessary for certain persons to work more time than herein provided, the Secretary of Labor may issue an exemption permit in respect to such persons, relieving the commodity from the provisions of this act.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to say, first, that I am in favor of this legislation. I shall not attempt to discuss the constitutional questions which have been so ably and so fully discussed by the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Idaho other than to say that I believe the constitutionality of the proposed law is an open question, such an open question, in fact, that I want to resolve the doubt in favor of the laboring people of the United States and place the responsibility on the shoulders of the Court to determine whether such legislation can be made to stand as the law of the land under the Constitution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Right on that point, does the Senator think that the Congress has the right to shift the entire responsibility as to constitutional questions to the Supreme Court?

Mr. DILL. I do not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Whenever we vote for these measures, does not each individual have to determine for himself whether they are constitutional or not?

Mr. DILL. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], a moment ago, was talking about the desirability of passing the bill so that the Supreme Court could pass on it. When I vote for the measure it will not be for that reason.

Mr. DILL. I take the position that where a question is of doubtful constitutionality, because there are no cases that apply in all respects, I want to resolve the doubt in favor of the legislation which I believe is so highly desirable and leave it to the Court to decide the doubt in the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Senators will stand on this floor, and I dare say the Senator from Idaho has done it repeatedly, and declaim against the encroachment of the courts on the legislative power. Yet Senators stand on the floor from time to time and "pass the buck", as it were, over to the Supreme Court by saying, "Well, we will let the Court pass on it." We are encouraging the very encroachment against which Senators declaim.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I say to the Senator from Texas that I do think it is the duty of this body to pass upon the constitutionality of an act, and I am not willing to be bound in my view as to its constitutionality by a 5-to-4 decision.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator. I was sure that was his attitude; but there was some suggestion that the Senator wanted the bill passed so that it could go up to the Court and the question be decided. While Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce, the Court, in passing upon an act, could determine whether or not we were using it as a pretext to do something which we have not the right to do, or whether we were really undertaking to legislate to control interstate commerce. Personally I think this bill is an attempt to use the power to regulate interstate commerce merely as a pretext for doing something which we have not the power to do directly.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I must disagree with the Senator from Texas in that closing statement. I do not think it is a pretext. I think it is a power which exists under the power to regulate commerce for the best interests of the American people.

Mr. CONNALLY. Tc regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. DILL. Yes; between the States.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator knows Congress is not going to regulate commerce between the States but is going to standardize it throughout the United States. It will not regulate it as between the States, but, using the power as a pretext of regulating commerce, it is going absolutely to standardize industry in every State of the Union, so that there will be no regulation of the commerce as between the States, because it will all be the same everywhere.

Mr. DILL. I appreciate the Senator's viewpoint, but what I wanted to say, when I opened my remarks, was that the constitutional question is so close, as we see when we read the decisions of the Supreme Court, that I am not convinced that the interpretation given by that Court is an established interpretation which may not very readily be entirely changed, and the history of the Supreme Court of the United States justifies the viewpoint which I hold, namely, that that Court sometimes changes its attitude on questions where there have been divided decisions by the Court.

I say what I do regarding this bill because I want it understood that I am offering this amendment as a friend of the legislation. I call attention to the fact that the legislation does not apply to the agricultural industry. The agricultural industry is omitted designedly, and yet as written, the legislation might easily seriously interfere with some parts of our agricultural industry, and with some other productive industry, so that I feel an amendment is necessary.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has studied the bill, and I am therefore asking him this question. The Senator says the bill would not apply to agriculture. It would apply, however, would it not, to any manufacturing plant dealing in raw products of agriculture, like the packing industry?

Mr. DILL. It would, I think, it is true, but that is not a part of agricultural production. There are some acts of manufacture, and particularly cannery manufacturing, referred to, and covered by this legislation, in which it does directly affect the production, as it were, not only of perishable foods, fruits, and vegetables, but also affects the fishing industry.

My attention was called most forcibly to the need of the amendment by people engaged in the fishing industry on the Pacific coast. I have here a whole sheaf of telegrams from people who are engaged in that industry, particularly in Alaska. They call attention to the fact that they must take their ships and go on a week's or two weeks' journey from the United States, particularly from Seattle and Tacoma and Portland, and even San Francisco, and establish locations in Alaskan waters for the purposes of fishing. They take their crews with them. They proceed to catch the fish, can them, and prepare them for the market. The fish must be canned almost as soon as they are taken out of the water; and under the fishing regulations established by the Bureau of Fisheries, fishing is permitted only for certain hours and is prohibited for certain other hours. During the period when fishing is permitted the people engaged in that business must fish continuously if they make the catch which they want to make; and if this measure should be applied to them as it came from the committee, they would be required to take 2 or 3 crews, probably, because there is no way to get labor up there. Not only that, but the natives of Alaska, the Indians, who fish and sell their fish to the canneries, would be affected in the same way.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I would state that representatives of the canning business, I think the president of the association, stated to me that under the necessity of doing their work within season, it having to be done without loss of time, this legislation would work untold hardship if applied to them.

Mr. DILL. For that reason I broadened my amendment, not only to cover fish, but to cover fruits and vegetables of a perishable nature. The fruit industry of the whole country, particularly the raising of peaches and pears and plums, the soft fruits generally, would be affected by this legislation. They must be canned immediately. They must be prepared while they are in a fresh condition. So I have written the first part of the amendment broad enough to take care of the fishing and seafood industries and also the perishable fruits and vegetables.

We have had protests from other industries, which do not deal in perishable foods, do not deal in fish, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] offered an amendment yesterday to meet that situation. We had a conference this morning, and, by agreement with him, I changed the form of my amendment as printed yesterday, and for that reason have offered the amendment containing both provisions, the second provision enabling an industry which finds itself in a condition where certain persons working in the industry must of necessity work more than 6 hours per day, to get a permit from the Secretary of Labor, if they can bring proof of the condition which necessitates such work by certain persons.

I do not care to take the time of the Senate to enlarge upon the discussion. I believe the amendment covers the exceptions which arise out of the fishing industry and in the perishable food industry, and I believe the second half of the amendment will meet the exceptional cases which no legislator can foresee in a country so large as ours, with industries so varied and conditions so widely different throughout the country.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama particularly to this amendment.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I come from a State where this amendment, relating to perishable foods, would be supposed to render more relief than anywhere else. We can oysters, we can fish, we can shrimp, we can grapefruit, we can oranges, we can peaches. Louisiana is probably the greatest State in the United States for the processing of perishable foods. We also grind cane in the fall. But I am fearful, I wish to say to the Senator from Washington, that we are going to defeat the purposes of this legislation if we undertake to provide for any particular exceptions. I think that if we do make any rule at all to permit particular cases to come from within the measure we ought to be very careful. I myself refused in the committee to undertake to make any exceptions.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that unless we do make an exception in favor of taking care of fish as soon as they are taken out of the water, without any restriction to a 6-hour day, or as to fruits which are perishable in certain communities where there is not sufficient labor, then we are taking an unfair advantage of those engaged in that kind of production that we do not take of those engaged in the production of other agricultural products which are not so perishable.

Mr. LONG. I do not know of any case where they could not prepare in advance to operate on a shorter day.

Mr. DILL. I think the Senator would find it extremely burdensome and almost impossible in the cases I have cited.

Mr. LONG. That may to some extent be true; but I do not recall, even in the canning of fish and oysters and shrimp but that they might not prepare to take care of that kind of emergency, also with regard to fruit. We raise everything down in Louisiana.

Mr. DILL. That might be true in certain instances, but I have just explained to the Senator that the people who go a thousand miles and more to Alaskan waters have no way of getting help. They would have to carry three times the regular number of employees.

Mr. LONG. I can understand such a case.

Mr. DILL. It would be unjustifiable for us to apply such a rule to such an industry. I do not believe the amendment would put any unjust burden upon the manufacturing industry generally.

I should like to have the attitude of the Senator from Alabama regarding the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, at the very beginning of the preparation of the bill originally I was confronted with the question as to its effect upon agriculture, whether it could be operated successfully in agricultural pursuits. On account of the varying seasons and short time when work can be done in agricultural places, I reached the conclusion that agriculture should not be included in a measure of this kind. I am convinced that there are some exceptions which would have to be made in order for agriculture not to be seriously injured in seasons when those engaged in agriculture must act, and act quickly.

I have gone over the amendment very carefully, and it is my judgment that there should be that much flexibility in the bill.

Mr. DILL. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a part of my remarks some telegrams relating to the Alaska fisheries.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 1, 1933.

Senator C. C. DILL,
Washington, D.C.:

May we request your influence exempt salmon canneries from provisions Senate bill 158? We fully in accord principle involved, but because peculiar conditions surrounding salmon industry, whose natural season has been greatly curtailed by legislative and departmental enactment provisions, this bill would throttle vital Alaskan industry.

Most Alaska canneries at isolated points where no labor market exists requiring canners ship their labor into territory further because of way fish run cannery employees don't work over average 6 hours daily for season, but there are few days in season when run heavy and fish must be taken care of.

NORTHWEST SALMON CANNERS ASSOCIATION.

MCGOWAN, WASH., April 2, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D.C.:

Refer to Senate bill 158, prohibiting interstate commerce in products of establishments in which any person is permitted to work over 5 days per week or over 6 hours per day. Fish canneries should be exempt as they have no control over runs of fish, and deliveries made to them must be canned immediately on account of their perishable nature.

H. S. MCGOWAN.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 1, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

We strongly urge your support to a change in Senate bill 158 exempting fish canneries account perishable nature of product, inability to control runs of fish, and Alaska housing problems for short season. Believe bill as proposed will seriously affect the Alaska and Washington fishing industry.

INDEPENDENT SALMON CANNERIES, INC.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 1, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Reference Senate bill 158, making 6-hour day. Urgently request you use influence have salmon canneries exempted. Would defeat original purpose by closing canneries. Runs of fish not controllable and must be packed immediately. Overhead created by having three shifts would be prohibitive.

DRESSEL COLLINS FISH CO.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 1, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
United States Senator, Washington, D.C.:

Referring to Senate bill 158 prohibiting interstate commerce in products of establishments in which any person is permitted to work over 5 days per week or over 6 hours per day. This bill, if enacted, would prohibit salmon canneries in Alaska and the Pacific Northwest from operating successfully for the reason that said canneries have no control over the runs of fish and deliveries made to them must be canned immediately on account of their perishable nature. Heavy advances made by banks in Pacific Northwest for this season's operations will obviously have to be canceled or materially reduced if such a law is enacted. If canneries should be compelled to operate under bill 158 it would mean the shutting down of many of said canneries and others would be operated on part time, which in effect would reduce the employment of thousands of men in both the Territory of Alaska and State of Washington. Your best efforts in excluding the salmon canneries of Alaska and the Pacific Northwest from this measure will be appreciated.

W. H. PARSONS,
Chairman First National Bank.

VANCOUVER, WASH., April 2, 1933.

Hon. MARTIN F. SMITH,
Representative from Washington,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.:

Strongly urge use your influence have Senate bill 158 regulating hours employment exempt canners of perishable products. During canning period impossible secure sufficient help under restricted basis as provided by bill take care of perishable products as fast as they mature. Unless bill amended exempt canners perishable products during canning season hardship on growers will result and loss of raw material.

WASHINGTON CANNERS COOPERATIVE.

EVERETT, WASH., April 2, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D.C.:

We earnestly enter our protest against inclusion Alaska and Puget Sound canneries in Senate bill 158 on grounds it will prevent many plants from operating at all. Lack of transportation, housing facilities, high costs make it impossible carry out its provisions when handling perishable commodities in isolated districts. If canning industries included effect will be great curtailment of employment.

FISHERMENS PACKING CORPORATION.
PURSE SEINE FISHERMENS ASSOCIATION.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., April 1, 1933.

Senator CLARENCE C. DILL,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

The passage of Senate bill 158, prohibiting interstate commerce in products of establishments in which any person is permitted to work over 6 hours per day, would close down every salmon cannery in Alaska. The larger portion of population in Alaska is now engaged in the salmon fishery; the catching of the fish is all tidal work; the time of the runs is limited in Bristol Bay. For instance, the fishing period is only about 3 weeks actual fishing time and this may be curtailed by stormy weather. It is a physical impossibility to transport the number of men required in addition to the Alaska population to run the canneries on a 5-day, 6-hour basis; housing and feeding accommodations are not available and could not be made available for the current year. If it were possible to overcome these obstacles the cost of packing would be nearly trebled, making the product so expensive that its sale would be impossible. If the bill is passed it should except establishments handling seasonable food products. May we respectfully ask your support to an amendment that will exempt all salmon and other canneries packing perishable marine and farm products. Passage of Senate bill 158 will not make more jobs but will throw out of employment many thousands of men now engaged in the salmon fisheries.

WILLIAM TIMSON,
President Alaska Packers Association.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 1, 1933.

Hon. CLARENCE C. DILL,
Senator, State of Washington,
Washington, D.C.:

Understand Senate bill 158, now pending, prohibits interstate commerce in products of establishments in which employees permitted work over 5 days per week or over 6 hours per day. Our cannery operations in Alaska seasonal, as fish available only from 30 to 40 days each year. Canneries are located in isolated areas, where impossible secure additional help. Necessary secure majority help from States. Provisions proposed bill would cut production at least 60 percent, making it impossible operate factories. Urge you propose and secure amendment this bill exempting canneries operating on perishable or seasonal products. Thanks for your consideration and fullest cooperation.

NEW ENGLAND FISH CO.

YAKIMA, WASH., April 1, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senator from Washington,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

We believe Senate bill 158, regulating hours employment, should exempt canners of perishable products during period perishables are being handled. Canning season of perishables occurs when demand for labor for harvesting crops in localities where our plants are located is at its peak, and it will be practically impossible secure sufficient additional labor these points to maintain production necessary to process fruit as they mature in order avoid spoilage of raw material and loss to growers if working hours curtailed during time when canning of perishables occurred, as bill provides.

Regarding Senate bill 158, establishing 6-hour day: Due to isolated conditions and lack of housing facilities, Alaska salmon canning industry cannot operate on basis outlined in bill. Please let this have your serious consideration.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

We are greatly interested in the furthering of the Alaska salmon industry, which we have participated in the financing of for the past 30 years. We understand the passage of Senate bill 158 prohibits interstate commerce to those whose employment of labor would exceed that specified. The Alaska salmon industry is so situated at far-flung outposts that it would be utterly impossible for them to provide sufficient crews to operate efficiently under the proposed bill during the short time the salmon runs. We are certain such legislation would not only seriously affect but put the industry in a position where they would be unable to compete with other food products or foreign supplies of salmon, consequently shutting their operation out completely. We therefore earnestly solicit your support in having an exemption made for the Alaska salmon industry.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA, N.A.

Senator C. C. DILL,
Washington, D.C.:

If proposed Senate bill 158 covering reduction of working days and hours is passed, would mean it would be impossible for anyone to operate salmon canneries in Alaska, this for the reason that it would be impossible transport and house the additional men made necessary under this bill. There is not sufficient floating labor in Alaska to take care of canneries, due to their isolated locations; also operation in Alaska very seasonal and limited to maximum of 3 to 4 weeks' operations.

WILLIAM CALVERT,
President San Juan Fishing & Packing Co.

EVERSON, WASH., April 1, 1933.

Senator C. C. DILL,
Washington, D.C.:

Senate bill 158—utterly impossible for growers to save their raspberry, blackberry, loganberry, and strawberry crop, all of which are highly perishable, if this bill finally becomes law. You cannot help agriculture by passing laws that prohibit growers saving their crops. Any one of these berry crops will mold on the vine in the Northwest if weather wet and unfavorable; absolutely necessary for canner to operate any time, night or day, Sunday or holidays, if grower presents this perishable crop to canner.

J. C. RICHENDORFER,
Director National Canners Association.

SEATTLE, WASH., March 31, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Referring to Senate bill 158, establishing 30-hour work for labor. Salmon-canning industry much disturbed. Salmon-cannery operations depend entirely on runs of fish which extend only few weeks of year, making working hours very irregular, as perishable food must be handled immediately. This bill would practically necessitate closing Alaska canneries, thereby defeating purpose of bill. Employment conditions in Alaska necessitate transporting 20,000 workers from United States for canning season during summer. To take care of perishable fish product under this bill would necessitate transfer of 50,000 employees. Insufficient steamer service and housing facilities in Territory for this purpose. Most canneries in inaccessible locations. No local labor supply. If bill passes in present form, means practically complete shut-down of Alaska salmon canneries throwing 20,000 people out of work. Therefore this association, representing 85 percent American salmon-canning industry, respectfully requests your cooperation in amending bill to eliminate word "canneries" at end line 5, or if that impossible, insert amendment eliminating canneries in all Territories, and particularly Alaska, where all operations highly seasonal and irregular.

PORTLAND, OREG., March 31, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Reference Senate bill 158, prohibiting interstate commerce in products of establishments in which any person is permitted to work over 5 days per week or 6 hours per day, in which canneries specifically named, we urge you arrange eliminate word "cannery" at end line 5 and insert words "excepting canneries." We positively favor share-work program, have already so arranged with our group, but cannery operations demand immediate handling perishable fruits. Severe penalty mentioned would cause many canners serious embarrassment, as not always possible comply with suggested law enactment. Will make canners play safe, having adverse effect rather than favorable. We will play fair without such restrictions.

Northwest Canners Association.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 3, 1933.

Hon. CLARENCE C. DILL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Referring to Senate bill 158, limiting labor to 5 days per week and 6 hours per day, in our opinion such legislation would practically prohibit operation of fish canneries, which naturally have no control over the runs of fish and whose operation demands from the perishable nature of the product that the fish be canned immediately. We very strongly urge that canneries, and especially fish canneries, be specifically exempted from the operation of this bill.

PACIFIC MARINE SUPPLY CO.

SOUTH BELLINGHAM, WASH., April 3, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C:

We are greatly concerned about Senate bill 158 as applied to salmon canneries in Alaska. We are one of largest packers and employers of labor in the business and know that as far as we are concerned the passage of the bill will result in less employment rather than more. At present we employ all labor available locally in Alaska, but take up bulk of our crews from the States. There could be no further local employment in Alaska, as there is no additional supply, and at most of our plants no local labor whatever. Passage of bill would render it impossible for us to operate in certain districts where catch is all made in 3 or 4 weeks, since we could not pack with one crew under 6-hour restriction, and, aside from prohibitive expense, it would be a physical impossibility for us to take care of additional crews to pack on this plan. We and other Alaska packers simply do not have the housing facilities at various canneries and cannot obtain them to take care of extra men that would be required under the bill. Even in districts where we could possibly operate with one crew for 6 hours result will be that there will be a decreased pack and no increased employment of labor, and the fishermen from whom we buy will be unable to dispose of all of their product, with consequent loss to them. Many contracts are already made for this year's operations and everyone concerned, both the men and the companies, will suffer heavy loss if this bill is passed on account of necessary readjustment. We feel that real distinction exists in favor of fish-packing industry in Alaska, as we cannot just blow the whistle and get more help. Would greatly appreciate it if you will offer or support amendment to bill exempting salmon canneries in the Territory of Alaska. Same applies to similar House bill when it reaches Senate.

PACIFIC-AMERICAN FISHERIES,
E. B. DEMING,
Chairman of Board.

SEATTLE, WASH., April 3, 1933.

Hon. C. C. DILL,
Senator from Washington,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

This associaion speaks for 13 herring salteries and reduction plants operating in Alaska. If Senate bill 158 becomes law, all reduction plants would suspend operations, throwing out of employment over 1,000 men and women. Our aggregate investment is over $2,000,000. Last year expenditure for labor was more than half million dollars, taxes paid Alaska over $40,000, freight charges to Seattle on products $150,000. Fish may be brought to plants at any hour, day or night, and must be cured when fresh to make perfect product. We simply cannot operate if we must confine ourselves to 6 hours' work per day. Fish are extremely perishable, and, when available, must be handled quickly and continuously until the day's supply is cleaned up, regardless of time required. The Bureau of Fisheries dictates the days and hours we may fish. Aside from their restrictions storms during the fishing season materially cut down our fishing days, and during the 4 months' season employees are idle 20 to 25 percent of time. Suitable help is not available locally and must be taken from Seattle. Losses have been heavy during past 3 years, and even if we can operate this year we don't look for profit. There are number of independent herring operators in Alaska whose interests are not included in figures given above. Law contemplated by bill 158 would wipe out reduction-plant industry and throw into bankruptcy most of the fisheries interests, which paid 81 percent of all taxes derived by Alaska last year. Please consider these facts earnestly and at least exclude Alaska fisheries from the bill.

Senator C. C. DILL,
Washington, D.C.:

We urge that exceptions be made for canneries and apple evaporators from the 5 day 6 hour bill, because fruits and vegetables are perishable and seasonal and must be packed at high speed during very short harvesting season.

ROSS PACKING CO.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. REED. Is it the Senator's expectation that the individual who now works 8 hours a day for a stated wage is going to receive as much for a 6-hour day, after the bill goes into effect?

Mr. BLACK. I discussed that yesterday. Of course, those who have opposed legislation of this kind every time it has ever been offered always base their opposition, first, on the ground that it might reduce somebody's wages.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think it will?

Mr. BLACK. As I stated to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] yesterday—and I will go over it again—it is my judgment that with a uniform law throughout the country, under which all competitors must observe the same rules, it will be very difficult to have a universal reduction of wages. I think organized labor, organized public opinion, and, to a large extent, many of the industries themselves, would oppose it. Many people appeared before our committee, some from the Senator's own State, engaged in manufacturing enterprises, who stated that they would not reduce wages, that they would be perfectly willing to pay the same wages for 6 hours they are now paying for 8 hours, because the employees of their competitors would all be working the same number of hours.

Mr. REED. If that proves to be the case, is it not obvious that the labor cost of manufactured articles is going to increase by about 33 percent?

Mr. BLACK. I cannot say it would be increased 33 percent, but I certainly sincerely hope it will be. I do not believe this country will ever recover until the aggregate purchasing power of the men who work comes up nearer in proportion to the profits that have been going to bloated capital.

Mr. REED. Is not the Senator in this dilemma, that either his bill is going to reduce wages, the real earning power of the working people in these industries, 33 percent, or it is going to raise the cost of everything the farmer has to buy?

Mr. BLACK. I would not say about raising the cost.

Mr. REED. It is going to hurt one class or the other, or both.

Mr. BLACK. I have heard everybody talking about raising commodity prices. If I am not mistaken, I have heard the Senator say that if commodity prices are not raised there cannot be a recovery.

Mr. REED. I grant that, but I want them all raised uniformly, and this would raise some commodity prices against the consumers of the articles.

Mr. BLACK. That is very well put, and the Senator is going to have a chance to vote for what will raise the purchasing capacity of labor, and then there is coming from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry another bill which will raise the prices of the farmer's products.

Mr. REED. And by the farm relief bill, you attack the suffering city workmen by putting a 100 percent sales tax on the necessities of life, and by this bill you either cut down that city workman's salary or you raise the prices of the farm products he has to buy.

Mr. BLACK. I am delighted to get the Senator's interest in the suffering city worker, because that interest will permit him to vote for this bill. We have evidence of people in Pennsylvania working 14 hours a day—hard, laborious drudgery—which it is very difficult for a man who has not done it to understand.

Mr. REED. I happen to know a good deal about labor conditions in my own city of Pittsburgh, and I do not know of anybody who is working 14 hours a day.

Mr. BLACK. Is the Senator familiar with the statement appearing in the paper this morning, about the 300 women who are on strike because, as I recall it, they are getting 5 or 10 cents an hour?

Mr. REED. Where is that—in Alabama?

Mr. BLACK. No; it is in Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I never heard of it.

Mr. BLACK. It appeared in the Philadelphia Record. The Senator can read it out in the reception room.

Mr. REED. I never heard of such a thing, and I do not think any such condition exists.

Mr. BLACK. It is in the morning paper. I read it this morning.

Mr. REED. The papers have been wrong before, and they may be wrong in that case.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that they are treating everybody very finely in Pennsylvania, but the public do not seem to think so, nor are they satisfied with the hours of labor.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will yield to me further, up in my city, in the steel business, many men are today getting only 1 or 2 days' work per week under our system of rotation of jobs.

Mr. BLACK. What hours per day?

Mr. REED. About 8 hours a day.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is sure some of them are not working over 8 hours?

Mr. REED. I am not sure some of them are not working over 8 hours a day, but I am sure none of them are working over 10, and those who are working 10 hours are glad to do it, because they get work for only so many days a week, and the effect of the Senator's bill would be to give them two 6-hour days a week instead of two 8- or 10-hour days a week.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator that they are anxious to do it, and so are all the other hungry and starving people in this country willing to work 15 hours if they have to do it in hard, grinding labor. If the Senator will read in the hearings in this case the statements of witnesses from his own State who came here to testify to the labor conditions in that State, as to the long hours they are working, how the working hours in the factories in his own State have been increased, according to the testimony of manufacturers, he will see why it is that laborers in his own State are working longer hours than he seems to know anything about.

May I call the Senator's attention further to the fact that if he wants to oppose the shortening of men's hours, why not oppose it on the ground that he is opposed to shortening their hours of labor? All manufacturers, all chambers of commerce, all organized groups that have stood for predatory plunder in this country since the beginning of its history have always based their opposition to reducing hours of labor not on the fact that they wanted to make more profit but they always say they are fearful it will reduce the compensation to labor. The very groups that have it in their power to fix the compensation of labor have always started the propaganda that a reduction in the hours of labor will reduce the compensation to labor.

I have in my office now a letter which came this morning from an organized lobby, which has been sent out to all lumbermen in the South, telling them exactly what to say against this bill—they have planned the whole thing—that it is going to reduce so greatly the wages of men down there who are engaged in the industry, although the owners have the right to fix the wages, that it will do a great injury to the workingmen. They will, however, all be on a competitive basis. Why not recognize the fact in this bill that machinery has advanced so far that it is necessary we should shorten the hours of labor? Why not be fair about it and give the men the benefit? It is true that some of them must keep on working long hours and others not be given any work at all. We can tax all industry to support 12,000,000 people, instead of dividing up the work and putting them all on a living basis.

I want to state to the Senator very frankly that, so far as I am concerned, if industry does take the position that it can reduce the wages, I am favorable to putting up to the Supreme Court of the United States the question whether the Congress can go farther, as was suggested by the Senator from Idaho, and see that they do not commit any such unpardonable crime under the conditions in which we now live.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, by the time the Senator from Alabama gets through there will not be any industry left in the United States.

Mr. BLACK. There is not much left now, and with what there is people are starving to death because they do not make enough to live on.

Mr. REED. That is true, and the tendency of just such legislation as this is what frightens business men and keeps them from going ahead.

Mr. BLACK. Well, this legislation was not pending in 1929.

Mr. REED. But it is pending now.

Mr. BLACK. It was not pending even in 1930; it was not pending even in 1931; and yet in 1931 the Governor of the Senator's own State, before this "iniquitous" bill was pending, came down here begging for money with which to feed the industrial people of his own State, when this bill had never even been introduced.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has been very eloquent, and he has covered a great deal of ground, but I am going to answer him directly.

I think that an 8-hour day is not too long for an American to work. I work that long and so does the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. That is true.

Mr. REED. And neither of us is any worse for it, and we would bitterly resent it if anyone were to say to us that we could not lawfully agree to work over 6 hours a day; we would not stand for it a minute. The average American wants work and he does not want to be limited in his work to 5 days a week and to 6 hours a day. He is not a child to be nursed in such a way.

If the Senator wants my frank reason for opposing the bill, in addition to its clear unconstitutionality, which would make it our duty to vote against it, according to my view, I think it is basically unsound, that it is sentimentalism run mad. That is my view of his bill.

Mr. BLACK. With reference to the statement which the Senator from Pennsylvania has just made, that it is terrible to reduce these men to 6 hours a day, calling attention to the fact that he and I work longer, that is true. However, we are not around any loom; we are not down digging coal in the bowels of the earth; we are not listening to the constant whir of machinery; we are not in a cotton factory. I wonder if the Senator has ever stood outside of a cotton factory and watched the pallid faces of the people who come out after they have served a few years' apprenticeship there? No; we are not doing that kind of work. We are taking away from the people, from plain, average, everyday American citizens, who, if they had the leisure, might get some of the advantages of life as we know it here—the advantage of leisure by which they could study and become better citizens of this country. I do not bow down in worship of hard, laborious, drudging labor in steel mills and in cotton factories. It is easy enough to talk about it when we do not do it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not understand that this bill is based upon the necessity for shortening the hours of labor because of the character of work men are doing.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. My understanding is that the theory of this whole bill, and the only justification for its enactment into law, is that by reduction of the hours and of the number of days of labor some of those who are now not working at all will be given an opportunity to work. That is my understanding of the theory of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct. It is not a question of reducing the hours of labor to 6, but think of the 12,000,000 who are unemployed and who are unable to obtain the opportunity of working even an hour a day.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

REVENUE FROM BEVERAGES IN THE DISTRICT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask that the conference report now lying on the table may be laid before the Senate for immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read the conference report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments:

On page 3, line 7, of the Senate engrossed amendment strike out "six" and insert "two."

On page 3, line 8, of the Senate engrossed amendment, beginning immediately following the colon, strike out through the word "business" in line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That it shall be within the discretion of the Commissioners whether any permit under this act shall be issued for the sale of any such beverages in any building in the District of Columbia owned or leased by the United States and used for the transaction of public business."

And the Senate agree to the same.

A NATIONAL PLAN FOR AMERICAN FORESTRY

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Printing I report back favorably two Senate resolutions, and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). The first resolution reported will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 57, submited by Mr. COPELAND on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the Department of Agriculture entitled "A National Plan for American Forestry" transmitted to the Senate on March 30, 1933, in response to Senate Resolution 175, Seventy-second Congress, be printed with illustrations as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the able Senator from Arizona a question. This is a favorable report from the Committee on Printing?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is.

Mr. MCNARY. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is.

Mr. MCNARY. What is the amount involved in the printing?

Mr. HAYDEN. The estimated cost of printing is $8,083. The manuscript consists of five typewritten volumes prepared by the United States Forest Service pursuant to a resolution introduced nearly a year ago by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. The work has been very carefully done, and the Committee on Printing is well satisfied that the information contained therein is particularly pertinent to the reforestation program which Congress recently authorized.

Mr. McNARY. Is this pursuant to a Senate resolution or to a joint resolution of the two Houses?

Mr. HAYDEN. The information was assembled pursuant to a Senate resolution.

Mr. McNARY. That was acted upon favorably about a year ago, the Senator says?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask what is the purpose of the compilation of the information?

Mr. COPELAND rose.

Mr. McNARY. Probably the Senator from New York will answer that question.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a year ago we were discussing the question of unemployment, and how we might give employment; and it was brought to my attention that through forestation a large number of men might be employed in a manner to add to the national wealth.

I presented the matter to the Senate in the form of a Senate resolution asking the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture to make an extensive and complete report on the needs of the country as regards reforestation, and what methods might best be used to bring about the result intended to be brought about by the resolution.

The Senate adopted that resolution of mine, and it went to the Forest Service. To my sorrow, the report was, I thought, unnecessarily delayed; but, as a matter of fact, when the report came to the Senate it turned out to be one of the finest, one of the most complete and one of the most convincing reports ever presented to this body, in my judgment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. As a member of the Committee on Printing, I was impressed with the importance of having this report made a Senate document, but I was very much disturbed about the cost being in excess of $8,000. May I ask the Senator if it would not be possible to boil down the report and reduce it so that the cost would not be so excessive?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, when I saw the report I was somewhat staggered myself at its voluminous nature; but when I studied it, as I did, I found that it contained material of tremendous value to our country just now, particularly in view of the fact that the Walsh bill has been passed, seeking to bring about reforestation. It would seem that this is a textbook which may well be used in carrying out the purposes of the measure which the Senator contended for so vigorously and so successfully.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this report is going to amplify in extent the knowledge that the public will have of forestation, and the fact that the Senator from New York vouches for its value, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

REPORT ON USE OF SILVER COINAGE IN EUROPEAN NATIONS

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 49, submitted by Mr. DILL on March 28, 1933, as follows:

Resolved, That the report on an investigation made in 1932 by Senator CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona, relative to the use of silver coinage in the 16 European nations whose governments are indebted to the United States be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, has this resolution received the unanimous sanction of the Committee on Printing?

Mr. HAYDEN. It has.

Mr. McNARY. What is the amount of money involved?

Mr. HAYDEN. The cost of printing will be less than $300.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I should like to get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the pending measure.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the pending measure has been, I think, very exhaustively discussed. Could we not reach a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on it, say, tomorrow about 1 o'clock?

I ask unanimous consent that we vote on the pending measure tomorrow at 1 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That would require the calling of the roll.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I can anticipate that situation by stating that I shall object to a vote tomorrow at 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he would agree to a vote tomorrow at a later hour?

Mr. McNARY. Speaking for myself personally, I think probably I would be willing to agree upon a limitation of debate commencing at some time tomorrow afternoon, but not as to any specific hour at which a final vote is to be had.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator, in order that an agreement may be reached, if possible, what he would agree to as to a limitation? So far as I know, there is not to be any further debate. In any event, we have from now until 5 or 6 o'clock today.

Mr. McNARY. I am not the only Senator to be consulted. In the usual practice the Senator should make his proposal, and others may object, or we may all consent.

Mr. BLACK. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Why not proceed with the debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	King	Robinson, Ark.
Ashurst	Couzens	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Cutting	Lewis	Russell
Bachman	Dickinson	Logan	Schall

Clark	Johnson	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Kean	Pope	White
Coolidge	Kendrick	Reed
Copeland	Keyes	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, before that matter is voted upon I should like to ask for a unanimous-consent agreement that beginning tomorrow at 1 o'clock debate may be limited to 30 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on each amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the agreement should read "on any pending amendment or any that may be offered thereto." If the Senator will advance the hour to 2 o'clock, personally I shall have no objection to the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the proposed agreement is not clear at present. I take it the Senator from Alabama means that after the hour of 2 o'clock tomorrow no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes on the bill, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes on any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered.

Mr. McNARY. Certainly; that is the implication.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to speak to that amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. I ask unanimous consent to have read from the clerk's desk, for the information of the Senate, a telegram relative to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WHEELING, W.VA., April 3, 1933.

Senator M. M. NEELY,
Washington, D.C.:

Understand Senate considering 5-day 30-hour week. We now work four 6-hour shifts each 24 hours wherever possible. Prevented in some departments in some States on account of labor laws prohibiting employment of women at night. It seems to us if working time is reduced to 30 hours all other labor restrictions should be null and void excepting as to minors. We favor the 6-hour shift, or even shifts of shorter duration, but the 5-day week is a handicap to us for the reason that our process is continuous as our furnaces cannot be shut down during their life, otherwise the furnace is lost or fuel wasted. These and similar problems should be carefully considered, otherwise serious difficulties will result from the passage of the 5 day 30 hour week bill. Our plants are located in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Oklahoma, New York, and California.

HAZEL ATLAS GLASS CO.,
J. H. MCNASH, President.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a very brief telegram and letter which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CARYVILLE, FLA., April 1, 1933.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senator, Washington, D.C.:

Passage of the Black bill on 5-day week 6-hour day would be most disastrous to the lumber industry. This would prohibit us from operating, especially in our logging department. We trust you will vigorously oppose the passage of this bill. We are depending on you. Letter following.

BASIL E. KENNEY,
Vice President and General Manager Brown Florida Lumber Co.

BRADENTON, FLA., April 1, 1933.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We understand that a bill has been introduced in the Senate (S. 158) prohibiting commerce in products that have been manufactured in plants operating more than 5 days per week and 6 hours per day.

While we believe that this will be almost a fatal hardship on all manufacturing business, we know that it will ruin perishable, seasonable food-conserving plants such as grapefruit-canning plants. Therefore we request that you use your utmost endeavors to have canning plants excepted from the operation of the law at least.

Thanking you, we are, yours truly,

FLORIDA GRAPEFRUIT CANNING CO.,
CLAUDE E. STREET, Manager.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Senator yield for just one statement?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. In connection with the telegram read from the lumber company, I desire to state to the Senate that I have in my office a copy of the letter sent out by the President of the lumbermen's association urging that these telegrams be sent to Senators, and giving the language of the telegrams to be sent, and giving the arguments to be made in the telegrams and letters to be sent to Senators and Members of the House. I shall be glad to show that letter to any of the Senators here who have received those telegrams and letters, in order that they may know the source which sent them here.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I just wish to add to the statement of the Senator from Alabama that the propaganda league will begin to get busy as soon as any humane legislation is offered. We can all expect to be flooded from every industry when anything that strikes a note to help humanity is offered. That is customary.

Mr. BLACK subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, immediately following the telegram received by the Senator from Florida from the gentleman in the lumber business, a letter from New Orleans, signed by Mr. H. C. Berckes, telling exactly what kind of letters to write to Senators, calling attention to the fact that they must be writen "vigorously." I think that a part of the message received by the Senator from Florida will be found word for word in this letter and the accompanying enclosure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The letter to which the Senator has referred is more modest than some communications that are directed at Members of Congress. Frequently they are informed that if they vote for or against the pending measure they will not receive in the future the political support of those who are conducting the propaganda.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. What is recommended here is to "wire your Senators and Representatives, vigorously stating your views."

I might state in this connection that the representative of this association appeared before the committee. He stated that he favored the shorter work week, that he believed it was absolutely essential for us to adopt it, but his only reason for appearing against the bill was that he favored having it enacted by each separate State instead of by the Federal Government, and he agreed there to see if he could not have the States adopt it. That has not been done.

I ask that the letter be inserted in the RECORD with the accompanying pages; and I desire to call attention to the fact that I have taken out the name of the gentleman to whom it was written. He belongs to this association and requested that I might not use his name.

There being no objection, the letter and enclosure were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, U.S.A., March 31, 1933.

GENTLEMEN: A news item from Washington indicates that the Black 5-day week 6-hour day bill was approved yesterday by the Senate Judiciary Committee. This bill, as you will recollect, prohibits all mills and factories producing anything to be shipped in interstate commerce where any person is employed or permitted to work therein more than 5 days in any week or more than 6 hours in any day.

This matter was seriously considered by our subscribers and directors at their annual meeting yesterday, and a resolution was adopted vigorously opposing this measure and urging not only the lumber industry but all citizens having the welfare of their country at heart to immediately take the matter up with their Senators and Representatives.

If this bill were forced to undergo the usual sifting of the Senate and the House, its impractical nature would manifest itself, but the conditions under which Congress is now acting and the facility with which it is passing measures considered emergency in nature make it not improbable that legislation of this kind may be passed, unless you and everyone else concerned make themselves heard and convince your representatives in Congress of its deficiencies.

For your convenience there is enclosed a digest of the reasons why the South, and the lumber industry in particular, should oppose this measure. You should immediately upon receipt of this letter wire your Senators and Representatives, vigorously stating your views. It might help to supplement that wire with a letter, indicating in detail how such regulation would adversely affect their constituents.

Such legislation would not affect you alone, and so you should also bend every effort to have other interests in your community, including your chamber of commerce, likewise immediately communicate their views to their representatives in Washington.

Yours very truly,

H. C. BERCKES,
Southern Pine Association.

COMMENTS ON THE BLACK BILL (5-DAY WEEK 6-HOUR DAY)

Lumber is the South's most important industry; it employs more people, pays more wages, and contributes more in taxes than any other industry in nearly every Southern State. Any plan to regulate or improve conditions of labor that is unworkable in this industry would seriously affect all of the people of the South and contribute to greater unemployment.

Operating time among southern-pine manufacturers has been reduced constantly during the past 3 years, now averaging 20 hours per week.

Sawmill and logging operations cannot be maintained, from a practical-cost and selling-price standpoint, with a 6-hour day. There is hardly a sawmill that is not losing money on every foot of lumber shipped. For more than 2 years many mills have continued production several days a week solely for the purpose of giving employment to the people of their community who are dependent entirely upon the operation of the sawmill. If the sawmill operators should be forced by law to employ their labor not more than 6 hours a day, it would be impossible for them to operate at all, for their already demoralized condition would not permit their absorption of the added expense involved.

Mills have gone very far in the last 3 years toward providing employment and taking care of their men and their families. Since the beginning of the depression they have staggered employment, alternating the personnel of shifts so that every man might at least earn something. If they should be forced to close down because of impractical regulations of this nature, untold distress would be created among the thousands of sawmill workers in every Southern State.

Even if it were possible to operate sawmills on a 6-hour day, the mere fact that half of the southern-pine production, for instance, is cut by the smaller mills, who are beyond regulation, would either make prohibitive the cost of policing or inflict an unfair burden upon the larger manufacturer, and thus perpetuate the present demoralized conditions in the industry.

Intermittent and irregular operation of sawmills is expensive; even under today's conditions of operation tremendous losses are being sustained in the production of small quantities by sawmills designed for larger outputs, which losses could be greatly reduced if the sawmill men felt no responsibility for the welfare of their workers.

There would be entirely too much lost motion in a 6-hour shift in the sawmill industry, and it would be prohibitive to run one crew 6 hours and employ another for 2. To work two 6-hour crews consecutively is impractical, considering other operating problems and the limits now placed on production. With respect to logging, particularly, it would be impossible to function under such regulations.

The effect of such legislation at any time would be to increase cost greatly in connection with all fixed expense, such as taxes, interest, insurance, depreciation, and obsolescence. Fuel and feed costs would be doubled. It would in many cases make it impossible to cut timber before cutting rights expired. Woods and railroad operations would be thrown into utter confusion, especially with mills hauling their logs long distances. Under today's conditions it would compel the closing down of hundreds of industrial plants that still afford some employment to thousands of our people.

The plan will prove unworkable and will fail to help those it is intended to benefit. No legislation designed to interfere with the right to work or the operation of economic laws of any kind ever has worked or produced any result save further confusion and handicap. Such laws are impossible of fair enforcement at reasonable cost.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the pending amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington. As I indicated earlier in the day, it represents the result of a conference this morning in which the Senator from Washington, the Senator from Alabama, and I participated, and it represents a meeting of minds upon a formula which undertakes to provide legitimate exemptions and exceptions without invading the legitimate prerogatives and purposes of the legislation.

Mr. President, there are certain exemptions in the bill, anyway; and the Senator from Alabama will correct me if I am wrong. It does not apply, for example, to executives or to office work; it does not apply to railroads; it does not apply, for example, to newspapers; it does not apply to agriculture. Therefore, if a further limited classification of exemptions is created, it is not necessarily in conflict with the genius of the legislation.

As the Senator from Washington so well said, if it is appropriate to exempt agriculture, it obviously is appropriate to exempt those processing operations in respect to agriculture which otherwise would be interfered with.

There can be no question in the world that canneries operating upon perishable commodities could not live under the restrictions to be imposed. The Senator from Louisiana indicated a doubt a moment ago as to whether there were actual situations which, if the effort were made, could not be actually brought within the rule proposed by the new legislation. I call his attention to the fact that there are numerous situations similar to that defined in the telegram which I now read to him:

TRAVERSE CITY, MICH., March 31, 1933.

Hon. A. H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

When a perishable crop is presented to a cannery for sale it is in its prime for canning, which means that it must be processed practically immediately for the benefit of all concerned if we are to maintain the present high standard of American canned foods for either American or export consumption. You fully realize that the majority of canning factories are located in more or less isolated communities, where three shifts of skilled or unskilled labor are not available, which would preclude the possibility of even opening a plant under the present contemplated law.

In other words—and I know this to be a fact from my own observation—there are situations involving the canning of perishable commodities which require continuity of operations, and those operations usually are in isolated parts of the country, where it would be a physical impossibility to contemplate an adequate labor on a staggered basis for just a few weeks or months of the year.

The same thing is true with respect to the manufacture of beet sugar. I am not referring to the topping of the beets; I am referring to the manufacture of beet sugar, which has to be a continuous process for the comparatively few days of the year the plants operate and those plants invariably are in sections of the country where it would be physically impossible to mobilize or enlist the necessary labor for these staggered operations.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, has any amendment been offered to take care of the sugar situation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The pending amendment would take care of it. So much for the first section of the pending amendment. It seems to me perfectly obvious that if the bill is to become a law the first section of the pending amendment ought to be attached in order to prevent needless tragedy, which is not in the contemplation of the author of the bill at all.

The second section of the amendment simply permits a judicial review in the Department of Labor in those intances, not now foreseen, where it is subsequently disclosed that it is a physical impossibility to proceed under the limitations of the measure. It would be an obvious error on our part to undertake to write a charter for all American industry of this nature in such detailed restriction at the present time, when we cannot possibly know all of the exceptions which might arise, and be urged in good faith, and which could be met in no possible way except by exemption licenses.

Therefore the author of the bill and the Senator from Washington, working with me upon this phase of the subject this morning, united in submitting the pending amendment, which would take care, I repeat, in the first instance, of perishable commodities, and situations in respect to agricultural processing which otherwise would be fatally jeopardized; and, in the second place, would take care of those at present unforeseen circumstances which might arise, and in which we all admit and concede that an exemption and an exception should be made.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I take it that the second section of the amendment would cover a wholesale bakery, would it not, where it might be necessary, in baking processes, to maintain operation longer than the hours fixed by the bill?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I would not undertake to interpret the second section in specific instances except as the full facts were submitted, because the rule speaks for itself:

> If there is satisfactory proof of the existence of special conditions making it necessary for certain persons to work more time than provided within these limitations.

Upon the submission of adequate and satisfactory proof, the permit issues from the Department of Labor.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that undoubtedly such an industry as I have mentioned, the wholesale baking industry, could submit to the Secretary of Labor proof of conditions under which they operate, and a case could be made out that that industry should be excluded from the operation of the law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is entirely proper, on the submission of adequate proof and demonstration of the good faith of the submission, to make an exception.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. That would not mean the exemption of the industry from observing the rules with reference to all of its employees. It simply would mean that if there were an individual employee whose work was of such nature that it would be absolutely imperative that that individual work more than 6 hours, the Secretary of Labor could give an exemption as to that individual.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is precisely my understanding of the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, if there were in a wholesale bakery an operator with peculiar talent, the facts could be set forth, and then that industry would not be blacklisted by reason of the employment.

Mr. BLACK. Of that particular individual.

Mr. COPELAND. That is right. I think the amendment is a very good amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan was formerly a distinguished newspaper editor, I believe.

Mr. VANDENBERG. A newspaper editor; I could not concede the balance of the definition.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator consider that a newspaper publisher was within the terms of the bill?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I would not. I am so advised, furthermore, by the author of the measure, with respect to his own interpretation of it.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not consider that a newspaper is manufactured?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not, in any such industrial sense as the language of this bill implies. I should prefer to have the Senator address that inquiry, however, to the Senator from Alabama, because perhaps he could answer more authoritatively, and I think the Senator from Pennsylvania should have an authoritative answer, so far as possible.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator from Alabama would tell me.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in my judgment there is no language in this bill which would justify the application of the law to a newspaper. I do not think it is a manufacturing establishment or factory. I never so intended, and it never occurred to me until after the bill was offered that anyone might think that it related to a newspaper.

Mr. REED. Would it apply to the ordinary job printer?

Mr. BLACK. In interstate commerce?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I think his establishment would be a workshop.

Mr. REED. What is the difference between the occupation of the job printer and the occupation of the printer of a newspaper? Does not each of them manufacture?

Mr. BLACK. There is a very obvious difference between a workshop and a newspaper establishment. A workshop is known as a workshop. A newspaper establishment is known as a newspaper establishment.

Mr. REED. That is true, but both of them employ printers, and they both produce a printed product, using ink and paper as their raw materials, and I am wondering whether it would apply to the newspaper business.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator may believe that this includes newspapers, and I am frank to state that I would have very high respect for the Senator's judgment on a legal proposition or a legal interpretation, but I never so intended. It is my judgment that it would not be related to newspapers.

Mr. REED. Of course, it would all depend on the terms "workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment", and I presume that would be a matter for judicial construction.

Has the Senator given any thought to the exclusion of managing officials and clerical workers from the terms of his bill? For example, it would be very difficult to have four general managers of a factory in order that each of them might work a 6-hour shift, and then I presume we would have to have a fifth and sixth in order to relay on the sixth and seventh days of the week, if it were a continuous operation. Should not the directing officers of these establishments be excluded from the measure?

Mr. BLACK. I do not believe this measure would apply to the officers of an organization. I am of the opinion that, under the amendment which has just been offered and explained by the Senator from Washington, there would be no question but that such executives could be excluded by the making of the application provided for in the bill.

Mr. REED. But I am thinking of what would happen to industry while the pleas for exclusion were being acted on. At present we have thrown a pretty heavy burden on the Comptroller of the Currency. The average bank out through the country cannot even get an answer to a telegram, the Comptroller's office is so overworked. This measure would throw a terrible burden on the Secretary of Labor. Thousands, hundreds of thousands, of requests will come pouring in here to Washington, and the senders will be very lucky if they get answers in 3 months. It seems to me we ought to make the exemption here, and not leave it to some bureaucrat to handle.

Mr. BLACK. With reference to exemptions, I might state that I spoke in the Senate on this bill at the last session. I stated then that I wanted it distinctly understood that the bill was not offered as a gesture, but was offered with the belief that it ought to pass and would pass, and at that time I invited all of the public, Senators and all who might be interested in the legislation, to present before the committee any matters they thought might be pertinent. I realized then and I realize now that there must be some exceptions in legislation of this character. Unfortunately, for some reason nobody presented any requests for exceptions of any kind whatever, and if the Senator will read the hearings he will note that in several instances I asked questions about how a certain matter could be reached, but there being no requests made and no amendments suggested, the committee did not take the matters up any further. When the question came up on the floor yesterday with reference to these particular matters which have been mentioned, I very gladly conferred with Senators in an effort to bring about a proper condition which would not place an undue or unfair burden upon industry.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit another question, I should like to know how long the taint will adhere to any article. For example, let us suppose that I quite innocently buy a box of matches in Washington. We will suppose they are manufactured here, but with 8-hour labor. Under the terms of the bill I would be guilty if I took that box of matches in my pocket across the Potomac River.

Mr. BLACK. Knowing the Senator's ingenuity as a lawyer and his skill as a practitioner of many years, which has brought about his employment from time to time by those who gave him very lucrative and well-deserved practice, I do not believe the Senator apprehends any danger on that score.

Mr. REED. The Senator is trying to soothe me with soft words. I put a simple illustration. If the purchaser of the article is affected by its original taint, then he cannot carry the article across a State line. If he is not affected by its original taint, it would be perfectly easy to evade the statute by selling the product of every factory to some so-called "broker", and have the broker make the shipment across the State line. If it did follow the article into the hands of a purchaser, I can see many difficulties that would arise, because innocent purchasers would find their property anchored within the State of origin, whereas if it did not follow into the hands of the purchaser, the act would be meaningless, because the purchaser in all cases would make the shipment across the State line. Has the Senator considered that seriously?

Mr. BLACK. I do not apprehend that people are in danger from too much law enforcement of any kind, or carrying it to too great an extent. It seems to me that recent history has shown that the trouble is in getting any law of any kind enforced, not whether anyone will try to carry it to absurd conclusions, and it would be an absurd conclusion to arrest the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, for instance, for having in his pocket a box of matches which he had innocently purchased and which may have been produced under restrictions coming within this bill, because there would be no reason why the Senator, in purchasing the box of matches with which to light his pipe or his cigar, should endeavor to see how they were produced. Of course, we know he would not.

Mr. REED. I gave perhaps an extreme illustration. But suppose that a blast furnace sells all of its product to a wholesaler, and that that man ships pig iron in interstate commerce. Would the Senator say that such a shipment was a violation of the law? If not, the act would be very easy to evade.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know exactly what the court would hold, but I do know what the court held in a case in which I happened to be interested. It was held that there must be some guilty knowledge or some intent before criminality could be attached to the conduct of an individual.

Mr. REED. Of course, that is axiomatic.

Mr. BLACK. If this broker knew that they were working over the time provided in this bill—and very likely he would know it if he was a broker who was selling their product—I see no reason why the fact that he is a broker and sells the product with that knowledge would exempt him from responsibility, the same as though he had originally manufactured the product.

Mr. REED. Very good. Now think of the situation that would surround a dealer in scrap iron, which is a very important commodity both in the Senator's State and in mine, millions of dollars' worth of it being sold every year. How can anybody know whether that scrap iron was produced by 6-hour labor or by 8-hour labor?

Mr. BLACK. Unfortunately, perhaps, I have been a prosecuting attorney, and I have found out that one cannot tell much about scrap iron.

Mr. REED. I know he cannot.

Mr. BLACK. And, as a usual thing, at least, in too many cases there is far greater criminality attached to it than anything else the Senator has suggested.

Mr. REED. Very good; but it merely illustrates my point, that the moment an article enters into the great body of goods that are on the market within a State it becomes impossible for anyone to know whether or not it is tainted by 8-hour labor.

Mr. BLACK. If it becomes impossible for the purchaser to know it, there would be nothing to do about it, if he has no reason to suspect it, and he is just following the usual course of business. The Senator has just said that it is axiomatic that there must be criminal intent, and clearly in that case there would be none.

Mr. REED. All right. We have thus outlined a method by which every producer of a standard article can ignore this act with complete impunity.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is suggesting an idea, but I hope he is not doing that for the benefit of any individual?

Mr. REED. No; I am not.

Mr. BLACK. But if the Senator believes that that is a weakness in the bill, I should certainly be very much gratified if he would make a suggestion and offer an amendment which would prevent an evasion of that kind.

Mr. REED. I do not know now how any such amendment could be drawn. I would suggest it to the Senator readily enough if I could think of it. However, I think this is one of the necessary weaknesses of this type of regulation.

Mr. BLACK. That would, of course, be a reason why it should be strengthened; and, as I stated before, I should be very glad to have suggestions in regard to strengthening it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I do not have the floor. I was simply asking a question.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. HATFIELD. What advantage, if any, will foreign commerce have over home commerce under the administration of this bill?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from West Virginia has evidently asked me a question on a matter that I have heard him discuss a number of times and upon which he has very settled views. I am frank to say to the Senator that I do not think anything I might say would alter those views; but, insofar as I am concerned, it is my belief that American industry, American skill, and American efficiency, which were so exceedingly well outlined in a speech made by the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] several years ago, are sufficient to enable America to compete, certainly with the high tariff wall which the Senator was instrumental in erecting some time ago.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am rather proud of my record in that respect.

Mr. BLACK. I know the Senator is. That is the reason I mentioned it.

Mr. HATFIELD. We are dealing, however, with a proposition here which proposes to reduce the hours of labor to 6 as compared with 12 and 14 hours in Europe and Asia. I am merely wondering what effect such a regulation would have upon our domestic commerce and whether or not the effect would be hurtful?

I wish to say to the Senator from Alabama that I am in sympathy with his idea.

Mr. BLACK. Might I say to the Senator, partially in answer, that I believe, as I said before, that our ideas are fundamentally divergent——

Mr. HATFIELD. That is very true.

Mr. BLACK. As to the background of the question which he suggests; but, approaching it from another viewpoint, the most this country has ever sold to foreign countries has been less than 10 percent of our output. At the present time it is a great deal less than that. Perhaps, if the figures could be actually computed for manufactures, it would be found that today less than 4 percent of our domestic production is sold to foreign countries. I do not state those figures as being absolutely accurate, but they are approximately correct. That being true, perhaps 95 percent of our customers must be found in this country, and the Senator, I know, will agree with my idea that it is necessary, so far as possible, to maintain the American market. There being at least 95 percent of the goods sold in this country, certainly it is of paramount and supreme importance that we first consider our domestic customers. Twelve million of them, we know, are wholly a loss as American customers. That being true, I would say that the figures will show that it would be far more valuable to give those people a purchasing power than it would be to attempt to restore the purchasing power of foreign countries.

I understand that the Senator is interested in the idea that probably foreigners might ship goods here and compete for American business, but the tariff has very well seen to that. In addition, in my judgment, the superior efficiency and productivity of the individual American working man and the individual American factory have been far more instrumental than has the tariff. The Senator might not agree with that, but I would invite his attention as to the proportionate productivity to an address in the Senate several years ago by the senior Senator from South Carolina. The information therein contained was compiled by a member of the legislative counsel; it was most instructive to me; and I feel sure it would be very interesting to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Would the Senator consider favorably an amendment to place foreign imports upon a parity with home products?

Mr. BLACK. I would think that at this time that would be a most unfortunate amendment. While some do not agree, there are many who honestly believe that a part of our trouble has been brought about by tariffs which practically reach an embargo; but whether one agrees with that idea or not, it is certainly true that the tendency of the world today is to try to bring about better trade relations; and I would believe that such an amendment as the Senator from West Virginia suggests would be very unfortunate.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I inquire whether the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is now before the Senate?

Mr. DILL. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the Senator familiar with the fact that the other House has adopted an amendment somewhat similar to his amendment? Has the Senator from Washington examined that amendment?

Mr. DILL. I have not. I understood, however, that there was such an amendment, but that it was much longer than mine and somewhat involved. I have not seen that amendment. In any case, I think that the matter ought to go to conference.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may we have the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, line 9, after the word "day", to insert the following:

Provided, This section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character.

Provided further, That upon the submission of satisfactory proof of the existence of special conditions in any other industry included herein, making it necessary for certain persons to work more time than herein provided, the Secretary of Labor may issue an exemption permit in respect to such persons, relieving the commodity from the provisions of this act.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question, if I may. What influenced the committee in drafting this bill to limit the work week to 5 days of 6 hours. Why did it not limit it to 5 days of 7 hours or 5 days of 8 hours or some other limitation? What led it to agree to make the requirement 5 days of 6 hours?

Mr. BLACK. It was made a 30-hour week by me.

Mr. WALSH. The question presents some complaints I have heard made against this proposed legislation. Some fear it is too drastic. The factories now employing labor 48 hours or 56 hours per week claim that they will be obliged, if this bill becomes a law, to cut the time one half, or nearly one half, in many instances and in many instances to cut weekly wages nearly one half. It has been argued that it would be better to experiment awhile with a work week of many less hours than at present rather than a 30-hour week. I should like to have the Senator explain what led to the conclusion that the soundest and best public policy, under the circumstances, would be to require a 30-hour week rather than, say, a 36-hour week.

Mr. BLACK. At the last session of Congress the Judiciary Committee of the Senate had this bill under consideration. A subcommittee was appointed to study and investigate the measure, and there appeared before that subcommittee many witnesses. There was not a single individual who appeared before the committee who did not agree that it was desirable to reduce the hours of labor.

Mr. WALSH. I think public sentiment is in accord with that idea. I have long favored it. In 1931 I introduced a 5-day week bill for Government employees.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to give the Senator this background, in answer to his question. There were two outstanding witnesses who appeared against the bill. One was a Communist, and very frankly his evidence shows that he objected to it because he did not want anything written into the law that might preserve this country from what he called "a crisis." The other chief witness was Mr. Emery, of the National Manufacturers' Association. His objection was to the change being made by law. Everyone who appeared before the committee was in sympathy with the object of the bill. There were many manufacturers who appeared before the committee as well as the heads of the American Federation of Labor. One witness, who is the largest plush manufacturer in the world—I have forgotten his name; he comes from Rhode Island, I believe, and has a number of factories, one being in Pennsylvania——

Mr. WALSH. What kind of a manufacturer?

Mr. BLACK. A plush manufacturer. He stated that he had carefully investigated the facts concerning labor and that there never had been a time during the height of prosperity in 1928 when his industry could have absorbed more than 60 percent of the potential labor. He and numerous others recommended a 30-hour week.

Mr. WALSH. Did they agree in their recommendation of a 30-hour week that the wages now paid for a 48-hour week or a 56-hour week would be maintained?

Mr. BLACK. One of the witnesses, who had five factories, I believe, wanted a minimum wage provision put in the bill. Another, who was a large worsted manufacturer, said that wages would take care of themselves, because this bill would naturally reemploy a great many people and that, in addition, since all the people engaged in the same line of business would be required to obey the same restrictions as to hours of labor, competition would not demand that they bring about a reduction in wages in proportion to the reduction in the hours of labor.

Mr. WALSH. My thought is that if the hours of labor were reduced less drastically there would be more likelihood of the present wage standard being maintained. Is not that true?

Mr. BLACK. I do not say that is so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, among those who favor reducing the hours of labor as a method of spreading employment so as to give opportunity for work to many who cannot now obtain it, there are some who feel that this reduction is too great to be put immediately into effect.

Mr. WALSH. And especially to keep the present standard of wages. I do not want to see additional reductions in wages. We should keep weekly wages up as well as reduce the work week.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And, in all probability, on tomorrow an amendment will be proposed designed to modify the provision in the bill of the Senator from Alabama so as to authorize 35 hours for a week instead of 30 hours. The question, I think, cannot be disposed of today, and I think it will be necessary to give some consideration to it. Everyone here, I believe, wishes to see——

Mr. WALSH. Employment more widely spread.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A different arrangement from that which now prevails so that employment may be spread to include as many as practicable.

Mr. WALSH. With the least possible reduction in wages.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. At the same time it is not desirable so to limit the hours that an imperative demand will be made for a comparative reduction in wages. That is a problem of very great importance and difficulty.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator think that the limitation of hours as provided in the bill might result in a reduction of wages?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Many feel as the Senator from Massachusetts fears. If the bill may now go over until tomorrow, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] may be afforded an opportunity to dispose of the joint resolution in which he is interested, or to have it considered, I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama that I think, in all probability, some amendment on the subject matter discussed by the Senator from Massachusetts may be proposed. Following the request of the Senator from North Dakota and its disposition, if the request shall be granted, I shall ask for a brief executive session.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the Senator's suggestion and will be interested in his proposed amendment. I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that, as he knows, I am not out of sympathy with this proposed legislation. I have favored, as a great humane policy, the reduction of hours of labor, as well as an emergency necessity. My inquiry was simply to find out what assurances he had received from witnesses, employers, and others that there would be less likelihood of a reduction in wages by fixing the work week at 30 hours rather than some other number of hours. That was the purpose of my inquiry. I am in general sympathy with the importance at this time of spreading employment; but I do think that perhaps a work week of a few more hours might result in a less sharp decline in wages than may happen with a sudden drop of a work week of from 48 to 56 hours, which is the usual number in the textile industry—56 in the South and 48 in New England—to a work week of 30 hours.

Mr. BLACK. I might say to the Senator that I placed in the RECORD more than a week ago a statement, under a Geneva date line, showing the effect of the reduction of hours of labor in Europe. In some instances it actually brought about an increase in wages.

Mr. WALSH. Was the reduction in the number of hours a job as is proposed in the Senator's bill?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; it amounted to a 5-day week and a 6-hour day.

Mr. WALSH. This bill requires a reduction in some instances from 56 hours, which is the factory law in some States, to 30 hours.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that; but if it covers all industry, it is immaterial whether it provides for a 30-hour week or a 40-hour week, for each competitor will have to go along on the same basis. I admit, as I said yesterday, quoting the man whose name I did not mention, that the spirit of commerce is the spirit of greed; that too many times anything is accepted as an excuse to cut wages; and I believe that about the only way we can control that, unless we shall reach a time when employers go so far that we will have to enact legislation on the subject, is by the strong coercion of public sentiment and of organized labor.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator knows that industries in New England, particularly the textile industry, have for a long time been desirous of a uniformity of labor laws in connection with employment in the textile industry, and the amendment to the Constitution looking toward the abolition of child labor was a move in that direction, to try to bring about uniformity in the hours of labor throughout the whole United States of America. This bill certainly is a move in that direction; and one thing is certain—that the industries of New England and other northern States will be less under the handicap they are now of being obliged to give their employees shorter hours of labor than are rendered for like wages in the other parts of the country.

I thank the Senator for the information.

Mr. HATFIELD. I offer an amendment to the pending legislation to be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

JUDGMENT AGAINST PAN AMERICAN PETROLEUM CO.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay action upon the business pending before the Senate; but an emergency exists which calls for the Senate's action on Senate Joint Resolution 13, which is Order of Business No. 8 on the Senate Calendar, which will cause me to ask to have the pending bill temporarily laid aside in order to take up Senate Joint Resolution No. 13.

Before making the motion I shall state, as briefly as I can, just what is the purpose of the joint resolution.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the Senator intend to move to take up the joint resolution with the result of displacing the unfinished business, or is he asking unanimous consent to do so?

Mr. NYE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that Senate Joint Resolution No. 13, which is Order of Business No. 8, be taken up at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I cannot consent to the request made in that form and fashion. If the Senator will make a statement of the purpose of the joint resolution, and then accompany it with a request, I shall then consider the proposition. Meanwhile, I shall object.

Mr. NYE. I will thank the Senator, then, if he will withhold his objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withhold his objection?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the joint resolution authorizes the Attorney General, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Navy, to release claims of the United States upon certain assets of the Pan American Petroleum Co. and the Richfield Oil Co. of California and others in connection with collections upon a certain judgment in favor of the United States against the Pan American Petroleum Co. heretofore duly entered.

The judgment to which the title of the joint resolution refers grows out of the prosecutions following the disclosures of the Senate investigation involving the leases upon the naval oil reserves. It will be recalled that the Senate authorized the engagement of special counsel to prosecute these cases. One of the actions brought—that against the Pan American Petroleum Co. and against the Richfield Oil Co., one of which is a subsidiary of the other—resulted in a judgment being rendered against these companies in favor of the Government in the amount of $9,277,666.17.

Since that judgment was obtained both of these companies have gone into receivership, and any attempt to collect upon the judgment could not win for the Government as much as a million dollars at this time.

Certain properties of these oil companies, however, seem to be desired by larger distributors of oil, who are ready under stipulation to insure that the Government will receive at least $5,000,000 on the face of this $9,000,000 judgment if the stipulation is entered into. The Attorney General now is asking for that right. It does not in any way compromise the whole judgment which the Government holds.

The matter was laid before the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys last February, in the old Congress; and after very careful consideration and deliberation the committee unanimously reported to the Senate a like joint resolution, and it was passed by the Senate. It went to the House, and there failed, for some reason or other, to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands of the House, and it died.

The joint resolution for which I am asking consideration now is not unlike in any particular the joint resolution which passed the Senate in February. In fact, the Public Lands Committee of this Congress has acted upon this joint resolution, and has unanimously directed that it be reported to the Senate.

The Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy in the administration that went out of existence on March 4 recommended favorable action upon this joint resolution. Likewise, its passage was urged by the special counsel engaged by the Government. Since March 4 the joint resolution has been referred to the Secretary of the Navy and the Attorney General in the new Cabinet; and, as the report in the Calendar reveals, they have likewise favored and urged its immediate passage.

Mr. President, with that explanation I hope the Senator from Oregon will see fit to withdraw his objection to the consideration and passage of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me ask the able Senator from North Dakota whether the Attorney General appeared in person before the committee.

Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President. An assistant to the Attorney General did appear.

Mr. McNARY. Did the Attorney General express himself in a written opinion as favorable to this action?

Mr. NYE. He did; and the report which accompanies the joint resolution contains his letter in full.

Mr. McNARY. Has that letter been published in the RECORD.

Mr. NYE. It has been published in the report of the committee, which is on the calendar at this time.

Mr. McNARY. But it has not been published in the RECORD?

Mr. NYE. No.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest to the Senator, should I consent to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution, that the letter be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following his remarks, so that it may indicate upon what basis the plea is now being made, because this is a very large judgment. The amount stated is a very small compromise for this huge judgment. Standing by itself, it does not appear to be in the public interest, and I am only willing to consent in view of the statement the Senator has made.

Mr. NYE. I think the Senator's point is a very splendid one; and I ask that the letters of the Attorney General and his special assistants under date of February 13, 1933, which are contained in the report accompanying this joint resolution, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., February 13, 1933.

HON. GERALD P. NYE,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands and Surveys,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR NYE: I am advised that the suit for the cancelation of three leases (commonly known as the E, I, and G leases) in Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 1, California, has been brought to a successful conclusion including a judgment against the defendant in the sum of $9,277,666.17, with interest at 7 percent per annum from November 29, 1932, until paid. The defendant is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Richfield Oil Co. of California. Before final judgment was obtained both companies went into receivership and I am advised are hopelessly insolvent.

A stipulation has been negotiated which, without compromising the judgment, is expected to result in the collection of over $5,000,000 from the assets of the two insolvent companies to apply on the judgment. It has been possible to negotiate this stipulation only because the Standard Oil Co. of California is willing to offer the reorganization committees $23,025,000 for the assets of the companies, exclusive of possible claims of the receiver against Mr. Edward L. Doheny, cash in the hands of the receiver of the Pan American Petroleum Co., and the proceeds of an application of that company to the United States for a refund of income taxes.

The stipulation is so drawn that at the public auction of the assets any other company has the right and opportunity to bid more than has been offered by the Standard Oil Co., in which event the Government would share in the benefits of such higher bid. The Government will receive whatever amount is allowed as a refund of income taxes, the cash in the hands of the receiver of Pan American Petroleum Co. when the estate is ready to close, and the proceeds of any recovery from Mr. Doheny not exceeding the balance remaining due on the judgment. On account of these contingencies the recovery may be more than $5,000,000.

In order to consummate this settlement it will be necessary to assure any purchaser of three strip leases across the northern portion of sections 1 and 2 in said naval petroleum reserve, known as the "D", "H", and "F" leases, or as the "Visalia 010032, 09264, and 010097" leases, that the United States will make no claim said leases are voidable on account of fraudulent dealings between Mr. Doheny and former Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall, or that said leases are illegal. These strip leases have never been in question, and are now entirely satisfactory to the United States. The Secretary of the Navy desires to be in a position to have the wells on these leases operated whenever the wells upon bordering private property are operated in order to offset drainage from the naval petroleum reserve. He considers the royalty rates fixed in the leases fair to the Government and is willing to consent to their assignment to the purchaser at the receiver's sale if reputable, responsible, and for a fair consideration.

The Standard Oil Co. purchased some of the oil and petroleum products produced from the E, I, and G leases which were set aside in this suit from the Pan American Petroleum Co. and paid in full for such oil. The purchases were under written contracts entered into before the dealings between Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny were disclosed and the written contracts were approved by First Assistant Secretary of the Interior E. C. Finney. The Standard Oil Co. maintains it is under no liability to the Government for the value of such oil, but if it is to be the means of financing the partial satisfaction of the judgment against the Pan American Petroleum Co. aforesaid, feels that it should be under no fear of litigation to hold it responsible for the value of such oil. Under all the circumstances, I am of the opinion there is merit and fairness in its point, but, regardless of the point, I regard the opportunity to secure the large payment on the Government's judgment aforesaid, as more desirable than the insistence by the United States upon a probable claim against the Standard Oil Co. of California.

The stipulation was signed by my special assistants, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy and myself. A copy of their report to me, including a copy of the stipulation and a statement of the collateral understanding with the Standard Oil Co. is furnished you herewith.

We approve of the stipulation and of a collateral understanding with the Standard Oil Co. relative to the release of any liability for oil it purchased, which was produced from the E, I, and G leases, upon condition that it carry out its aforesaid offer. A serious legal question exists as to whether the Attorney General has authority to adjust the claims of the United States to have its judgment paid out of certain assets. There is a statute allowing compromises approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the Treasury Department has had nothing to do with this claim, and I am reluctant to ask the Secretary of the Treasury to take action on a matter respecting which he is not informed. For these reasons, before indicating our approval to the other parties to the stipulation, we desire the Congress to have full information and to expressly authorize us to secure the aforesaid collection on said judgment, the understanding with the Standard Oil Co., and make such further incidental compromises as under the exigencies of concluding the collection of the judgment may seem advisable to us or our successors in office. For your information I inclose a report addressed to me by the special assistants in charge of this case, dated February 13, 1933, which explains the matter fully. Accordingly we submit herewith a form of resolution for adoption by the Congress if it approves thereof.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM D. MITCHELL,
Attorney General.

Approved.

C. F. ADAMS, Secretary of the Navy.

REPORT CONCERNING COLLECTION OF JUDGMENT AGAINST PAN AMERICAN PETROLEUM CO.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 13, 1933.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Pursuant to the resolution of Congress, approved by the President February 8, 1924, Hon. Atlee Pomerene and Hon. Owen J. Roberts, as special counsel for the United States, on March 17, 1924, brought suit to cancel two contracts and two leases pertaining to the lands in naval petroleum reserve no. 1, California, upon grounds of fraudulent conduct between Albert B. Fall, formerly Secretary of the Interior, and Edward L. Doheny, and of absence of authority in law for the making of the contracts and leases. The leases involved in that suit covered the major portion of said naval petroleum reserve, but did not include three leases covering 661 acres in sections 1 and 2 of said reserve, because said resolution of Congress was interpreted as giving said special counsel no authority to sue for the cancellation of these three leases officially known as "Visalia 010042, 010043, and 010097", and commonly known as the "E, I, and G" leases.

The $100,000 passed from Mr. Doheny to Mr. Fall on November 30, 1921. The E and I leases were made on December 14, 1921, and the G lease on February 8, 1932. The contracts and leases involved in the suit brought by special counsel were executed upon later dates in 1922.

Pursuant to the request of Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur, then Secretary of the Navy, and Hon. Hubert Work, then Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, through his special assistant, S. W. Williams, on September 3, 1924, commenced suit for the cancelation of the E, I, and G leases. This suit was continued from time to time until the suit commenced by special counsel should be decided. The suit commenced by special counsel was brought to a successful conclusion with the decision of the Supreme Court on February 28, 1927.

In the meantime a suit under the direction of the Attorney General to cancel a lease which had been made in April 1922 to the Belridge Oil Co., covering the east quarter of sec. 34, T. 30 S., R. 24 E., in naval petroleum reserve no. 1 was decided in favor of the defendant. There was no evidence that Mr. Doheny or any of his companies had any interest in this lease or exercised any influence to aid the Belridge Oil Co. in procuring it.

Shortly before July 12, 1927, the Attorney General appointed the Hon. Atlee Pomerene and the Hon. Owen J. Roberts, as special assistants, to conduct the suit for the cancelation of the E, I, and G leases and on that date they filed an amended bill of complaint for that purpose and for incidental relief. Before the case came on for trial Mr. Roberts resigned and other special assistants to the Attorney General were appointed to assist Mr. Pomerene. The case was tried at Los Angeles in December 1929, and decided by the district judge against the United States on November 8, 1930. On February 5, 1932, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, for the Ninth Circuit, reversed the decision of the district court and directed a decree in accordance with the prayer of the amended bill of complaint. On October 10, 1932, the Supreme Court denied an application for writ of certiorari and on November 7, 1932, denied an application for rehearing.

Pursuant to the mandate of the court of appeals the district court on November 29, 1932, entered a final decree canceling the E, I, and G leases and directing the defendant to account for the value of all oil and oil products taken from said leaseholds. The account was filed on January 9, 1933, showing the sales value of the petroleum products taken from said leases, less royalties already paid into the Treasury of the United States, at $6,130,-531.85 with interest thereon in the sum of $3,175,103.86, making a total of $9,305,635.71. Credits were allowed in the sum of $27,-969.54 in accordance with stipulations entered into during the progress of the litigation for the repairing of wells so that they could be indefinitely closed down. The balance is $9,277,666.17, for which, on motion of said special assistants to the Attorney General, judgment was entered on January 14, 1933, together with interest thereon from November 29, 1932, until paid and for the taxable court costs of the plaintiff.

At the time the leases were made Pan American Petroleum Co. was a wholly owned subsidiary of the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., which was under the domination of Mr. Doheny. During the summer of 1928 the Richfield Oil Co. of California acquired the indirect control of Pan American Petroleum Co. and in July 1929 acquired all of the capital stock of said company. In a suit by a creditor, and with the consent of the Richfield Oil Co., a receiver for it was appointed on January 14, 1931. In a suit by a creditor, and with the consent of the Pan American Petroleum Co., the receiver for the Richfield Oil Co. was on March 5, 1932, appointed also receiver for said subsidiary. Both companies have proven to be hopelessly insolvent.

Bonds secured by a first mortgage upon practically all of the property owned by Pan American Petroleum Co. on December 15, 1925, are outstanding in the principal amount of $10,441,400 with accrued interest to October 31, 1932, in the amount of $1,223,-993.11. Unpaid property taxes on December 9, 1932, amounted to $139,841.50, according to the books of the company. There are other liens in small amounts.

Bonds secured by a mortgage dated May 1, 1929, upon certain property of the Richfield Oil Co. are outstanding in the amount of $24,981,000 with accrued interest to October 31, 1932, of $3,155,-100.34. Accrued property taxes amount to $111,182.68, according to the books of the company. There are also other liens in small amounts.

Unsecured claims of private parties against the Pan American Petroleum Co. aggregate approximately $700,000. In addition to the bondholders' claims against Richfield Oil Co. there are other private claims aggregating approximately $35,000,000.

Separate committees have been organized to represent each of the following:

1. Bondholders under the Pan American Petroleum Co. mortgage trust indenture.
2. Bondholders under the Richfield Oil Co. mortgage trust indenture.
3. Unsecured bank creditors of Richfield Oil Co.
4. Unsecured trade creditors of Richfield Oil Co.

The committees have separate attorneys and the trustees under the mortgages have separate attorneys.

The representatives of the committees and the trustees have been working since the receivership of the Richfield Oil Co. to get some plan of reorganization. Under existing general business conditions any plan of reorganization involves a sale of the assets and business in receivership. At various times the Cities Service Co., Consolidated Oil Corporation, and Standard Oil Co. of California have shown interest. We verified the fact that at the present time the Standard Oil Co. of California is the only company ready and willing to make a definite proposition upon which to base calculations. The proposition it made to the committees was to issue its securities of an estimated value of $22,500,000 in exchange for all of the assets of the Richfield Oil Co. and the mortgaged assets of the Pan American Petroleum Co. The first report to us was that it would not be interested in purchasing the unmortgaged assets of Pan American Petroleum Co.

Under these circumstances our problem was how to proceed to collect the aforesaid judgment of the United States against Pan American Petroleum Co. The United States Bureau of Investigation examined the books and records of both companies to furnish the information desired, and their report is on file with you.

It was found that shortly after the Richfield Oil Co. acquired all the stock of Pan American Petroleum Co. the business of the latter company was conducted by the former. The books of the two companies were consolidated and for operating purposes the Pan American Petroleum Co. ceased to exist as a separate corporate entity. The intangible and much of the tangible movables of the Pan American Petroleum Co. were confused with similar properties of the Richfield Oil Co. Due to such confusion and the consolidation of the books, as aforesaid, the receiver of the Richfield Oil Co., upon his appointment, found it impossible to completely segregate the assets of his company from the assets of Pan American Petroleum Co., but his accountants, Price Waterhouse & Co., undertook to segregate the bookkeeping and start separate books for the Pan American Petroleum Co., showing, as they believed, all that could be definitely identified as its assets.

After the Pan American Petroleum Co. went into receivership, special counsel for its receiver was appointed to prepare claims against the Richfield Oil Co. and its receiver. Haskins & Sells were engaged as special accountants for the Pan American Petroleum Co. for that purpose. Their work has been checked by the United States Bureau of Investigation and found accurate. As a result the claims of Pan American Petroleum Co. against the Richfield Oil Co. and/or its receiver were agreed to be compromised by an allowance of $1,100,000 as a preferred claim and of $14,392,606.30 as a general claim. The $1,100,000 was considered to be the fair value of all the assets of the Pan American Petroleum Co. that could be traced into the hands of the receiver of the Richfield Oil Co. The claim of $14,392,606.30 was considered to be the value of assets which could not be identified as having come into the hands of the receiver of the Richfield Oil Co.

Production of oil, gasoline, and gas from the E, I, and G leases was sold or taken by the Pan American Petroleum Co. according to the following distribution showing the value, including interest, to January 1, 1933:

To Standard Oil Co. of California	$4,011,747.83
To Associated Oil Co	768,040.44
To Midway Gas Co	561,818.07
To Receivers Naval Petroleum Reserve No. 1	499.79
To Belridge Oil Co	1.85
To Pan American Petroleum Co	3,753,993.08
To Richfield Oil Co	404,218.71
To Los Angeles Midway Pipe Line Co	28,406.90
Grand total	9,528,726.67

Of the foregoing sums approximately three eighths represents interest. The total does not check with the judgment entered solely because of the difference in dates to which interest is figured and the credit for repairing wells and a credit of one half of the cost of treating casing-head gas in the process of extracting casing-head gasoline that was allowed in calculating the value of production.

This latter was a 50 percent compromise of the claim of the defendant that it was entitled to credit for the entire cost of such treatment in order to arrive at the value of the product at the top of the wells.

The Pan American Petroleum Co. has pending claims for refund of income taxes aggregating the principal sum of $823,788.67. These claims arise out of payments made in the years 1920 and 1922–26, both inclusive, and with interest would amount to over $1,000,000. The claims are being vigorously prosecuted by the representatives of the receiver of the Pan American Petroleum Co.

Debts owing to the United States by parties consenting to the appointment of a receiver are entitled to preferential payment, except as against bona-fide lien debts existing at the time of such receivership and receivership expenses (sec. 3466 of the R.S.; 31 U.S.C., sec. 191).

We consider the United States is entitled to all of the proceeds of the unmortgaged assets of Pan American Petroleum Co. These assets would include the proceeds of the claims aforesaid of Pan American Petroleum Co. against Richfield Oil Co. A hearing is now in process before a special master for determination of what assets are subject to the mortgage and what are not subject to the mortgage. Included among the unmortgaged assets are several Government leases of lands outside the naval petroleum reserves and the three strip leases across the northerly portion of sections 1 and 2 in naval petroleum reserve no. 1. The Secretary of the Interior has agreed to the assignment of the leases outside of the naval petroleum reserves to any reputable and responsible purchaser, if qualified under applicable laws to hold such leases. A purchaser will especially want to know that good title will be received to the said strip leases within the naval petroleum reserve.

These strip leases, officially known as Visalia 010032, Visalia 09264, and Visalia 010096, and commonly referred to as the D, H, and F leases, were made under the following circumstances:

In 1921 section 36, immediately north of said D and H leases, was being intensively developed by the Standard Oil Co. of California, and former Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels determined that the area covered by said D and H leases should be operated to offset drainage to said section 36. Before he issued the call for bids Hon. Edwin Denby became Secretary of the Navy and in April 1921 published a call for bids. Approximately 12 bids were received, among them a bid by Pan American Petroleum Co. at a straight royalty of 55½ percent to the Government. Before the bids were opened President Harding, on May 31, 1921, promulgated the Executive order which transferred the administration of the naval petroleum reserves from the Secretary of the Navy to the Secretary of the Interior. The bids were then forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, and the then Secretary, Mr. Fall, found the bid of the Pan American Petroleum Co. the highest and best. However, at the time there was a placer mineral claim to all of section 1 which was still being pressed by the United Midway Oil Land Co.

Secretary Fall arranged with Mr. Doheny that Mr. Doheny would accept a lease to the D area and permit the United Midway Oil Land Co. to be awarded the H area at the same royalties in consideration of the surrender by that company to the Government of said placer mineral claims. Secretary Fall signed the H lease to said United Midway Oil Land Co. under date of July 8, 1921, and signed the lease on the D area to the Pan American Petroleum Co. under date of July 12, 1921. The Pan American Petroleum Co. acquired the H lease in March 1922. The leasing of the area covered by both leases at royalty rates, bid by the Pan American Petroleum Co. had the approval of the Navy Department. The Navy Department has consistently to the present time given us to understand that the wells upon the D and H leases should be operated whenever and so long as the bordering wells upon section 36 are operated by the Standard Oil Co. and that 55½ percent straight royalty is a high and very satisfactory rate. It appears from the foregoing that these leases were made approximately 5 months before the $100,000 transaction between Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny.

The F lease is for two rows of wells across the northern part of section 2, immediately south of section 35, outside of the reserve. The lease was made February 8, 1922, at which time said section 35 was owned by the Pacific Oil Co. Said section 35 is now owned by the Standard Oil Co. of California. The lease was made under the following circumstances:

The Pacific Oil Co. had drilled a number of wells along the eastern border of its section to offset wells which the Standard Oil Co. had drilled along the western border of its section 36. At a conference late in October 1921, attended by Secretary Fall and representatives of the Bureau of Mines and of the Secretary of the Navy, it was decided that the F area should be leased to offset the wells in the southeasterly corner of said section 35 and to anticipate the further development of said section 35. Under date of December 1, 1921, Director Bain, of the Bureau of Mines, called for bids for a lease of that area and received quite a number. There was a placer-mining claim to the entire section which the Department of the Interior decided would have to be adjudicated before the F lease could be made. The Pan American Petroleum Co. acquired that claim and agreed to surrender it to the United States in consideration of the acceptance of its bid for the F area and an award of the balance of the north half of the section to it at regulation royalties. Its bid for the F area was at royalties, upon a sliding scale from 12½ percent to 35 percent for the grade of oil expected and which has been produced. This deal was recommended by the Bureau of Mines and the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior and approved by Secretary Fall. Thereupon, E. C. Finney, as First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, issued the lease under date of February 8, 1922. Thus it appears that the F lease was made after the $100,000 transaction between Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny. However, the Pacific Oil Co. has fully developed said section 35 and we are informed that the Navy Department considers the wells on the F lease should be operated whenever the wells in the southern portion of said section 35 are operated and that the rates of royalties carried in the lease are fair.

Of course, there are a great many other details concerning the making of the D, H, and F leases, but we believe we have given a sufficient summary for present purposes. We understand the Secretary of the Navy is ready to act upon the recommendations of Capt. H. A. Stuart, at present inspector of naval petroleum reserves in California, and Commander Thomas Moran, acting director of the naval petroleum reserves, and consent to the assignment of said three leases to a reputable and responsible purchaser, provided the purchase price is in a satisfactory amount.

We are of the opinion that the Richfield Oil Co. is liable for the entire judgment against the Pan American Petroleum Co. to the extent that it is not satisfied out of assets of the Pan American Petroleum Co. by reason of the fraudulent manner in which the subsidiary was dominated, managed, and its assets commingled with the assets of the parent corporation. The liability of the Richfield Oil Co. upon this theory is stoutly denied by the attorneys for all classes of creditors of the Richfield Oil Co. and by the attorney for its receiver.

The statement of disposition of the production from the E, I, and G leases, given hereinbefore, shows $404,218.17 to the Richfield Oil Co. and $28,406.90 to the Los Angeles Midway Pipe Line Co. This latter-named company is a wholly owned subsidiary of Pan American Petroleum Co., and deliveries to it were after it was under the control of the Richfield Oil Co. We contended that the Richfield Oil Co. was liable for these sums upon the additional ground that it purchased the oil while charged with knowledge of the fraudulent and illegal character of the leases.

The receiver of the Pan American Petroleum Co. is considering the advisability of a suit against Mr. Doheny to recover the entire loss suffered by the company on account of the judgment. Should the receiver decide to bring such a suit and should he be successful, of course, the amount recovered would be an unmortgaged asset of Pan American Petroleum Co. and applicable to the preferred claim of the United States, pursuant to the judgment, to the extent that it is not otherwise satisfied. In the stipulation, which has been submitted to you, we have been careful to save the right of the United States to have, or to share in the proceeds of anything recovered by the receiver of Pan American Petroleum Co. from Mr. Doheny and also to save the right of the United States to proceed directly against Mr. Doheny, should you determine such an action to be advisable.

From the statement of disposition of production, given hereinbefore, it appears that practically all of the sales to companies not affiliated with the Richfield Oil Co. were to the Standard Oil Co. of California, Associated Oil Co., and Midway Gas Co. The sales to each of said companies were pursuant to written contracts, made, submitted to, and approved by the Department of the Interior before the $100,000 transaction between Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny was disclosed to the Senate and the public late in January 1924. We have discovered no evidence sufficient to justify us in believing that any of said companies had any knowledge of the dealings between Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny, or of the illegal purpose for which the E, I, and G leases were issued at the time the sales contracts were made. They paid the Pan American Co. in full for all such oil.

E. C. Finney, now Solicitor for the Department of the Interior, advises that the sales contracts were approved upon the recommendations of subordinates and without any directions from the Secretary, Albert B. Fall.

The Standard Oil Co. was advised that we were considering the possibility of its liability to the Government for the value of such oil as it purchased and its attorney maintains it is under no liability.

We were at Los Angeles from January 6 to January 17, 1933, to try to negotiate a settlement of the Government's claims in a way that would not be a compromise of the judgment obtained but would permit the sale of the assets now in the hands of the receiver.

During the negotiations it seemed as if the numerous parties could not be gotten together upon a common plan. Twice the situation was presented extrajudicially to Judge William P. James and he urged the parties to compromise and prevent the disaster he felt would result from protracted litigation. Finally all parties agreed to the stipulation, a copy of which was sent you, and a copy of which is attached hereto and there are certain collateral understandings among counsel. Our signatures were understood by all parties to be subject to your approval and approval by the Secretary of the Navy.

The Standard Oil Co. of California was persuaded to cause a bid of $525,000 to be made for the unmortgaged assets of Pan American Petroleum Co. as a part of, but in addition to, its bid of $22,500,000 (in securities) for the mortgaged assets of Pan American Petroleum Co. and all the assets of Richfield Oil Co. provided that if such bid is made the United States will assure it of good title to the Government leases and will release it of any claim for the value of oil and petroleum products it purchased from the Pan American Petroleum Co. and paid for in full; $75,000 of the $525,000 was said to be considered the "nuisance value" of any suit the United States should bring to recover for such oil. If additional properties are adjudged unmortgaged an increase in the amount to be bid is to be negotiated.

In any reorganization under the circumstances of this receivership it is customary for the reorganization committees to make some arrangement for the purchase of the assets. The receiver then holds a public sale of the assets. The committees bid as much for the assets as they are justified in offering in view of the disposition they can make of such assets. Any other party is free to make a better bid. If the assets are knocked down to the reorganization committees, they then can convey the assets to the party who is the real purchaser. In view of the appraised value of the unmortgaged assets being much higher than the offer of Standard Oil Co., we refused to accept the $525,000 for a firm release of such unmortgaged assets, so the stipulation provides that if more is bid the Government will be entitled to the higher sum. This leaves the Navy Department free to see if it can find anyone that will appear at the receiver's sale and bid more for such assets. However, since the Standard Oil Co. will be financing an offer of at least $525,000, having the effect of an upset price, it will be entitled to a release of any claim that it is responsible for the value of the oil it purchased from the Pan American Petroleum Co. Furthermore, were it not for the fact that the Standard Oil Co. is furnishing the other $22,500,000 out of which the other sums to be received by the Government will come, the other provisions of the stipulation could not have been negotiated.

Of the $22,500,000 offered by the Standard Oil Co. for all the assets of Richfield Oil Co. and the mortgaged assets of Pan American Petroleum Co., a sufficient sum is allocated to the unmortgaged assets of Richfield Oil Co. to pay the unsecured preferred claims in full and an estimated dividend of 12 percent on general claims. Estimates before the amount of claims of Pan American Petroleum Co. against Richfield Oil Co. as aforesaid, were prepared and without considering the direct claims of the Government against Richfield Oil Co., were that general creditors of Richfield Oil Co. would receive about 18 percent on their claims.

We persuaded the parties to guarantee the United States that its dividend would be at least 15 percent and to agree that if the dividend should be more the United States shall be entitled to the greater percentage. As a result, since the United States should receive the proceeds of the claims of Pan American Petroleum Co. against Richfield Oil Co., the stipulation gives the Government an option to convert the general claim of $14,392,606.30 into a preferred claim (15 percent) of $2,158,500; $430,000 of the direct claim of the Government against Richfield Oil Co. is for the oil it and the Los Angeles Midway Pipe Line Co. received from the E, I, and G leases and $408,000 of that claim (making a total of $838,000) is a compromise of the alleged liability of the Richfield Oil Co. for the entire judgment against Pan American Petroleum Co. Since $430,000 of the claim is upon the additional theory of liability for oil received, it is allowed as a preferred claim without any option to convert it into a general claim, while the $408,000 is subject to conversion into a general claim of $2,720,000 in the event the dividend should be greater than 15 percent. We endeavored to get more on our claim. The Richfield Oil Co. is liable for the judgment, but its unsecured creditors refused to allow more than the $408,000 without litigation which might last 2 or 3 years.

At the time we were negotiating, the receiver of Pan American Petroleum Co. had cash on hand in the sum of approximately $380,000. This is the fund into which income is carried and out of which receivership expenses are paid. The trustee under the Pan American Petroleum Co. mortgage claims a portion of the income is from mortgaged property and should be ultimately distributed to it. We did not wish to have to concern ourselves with proceedings to adjudicate what portion of the income is from mortgaged property and what portion is from unmortgaged property, or how expenses should be allocated between mortgaged and unmortgaged property. The stipulation provides that to the extent the fund is depleted on account of claims of the mortgage trustee, the direct claim of the United States against Richfield shall be increased. Since the stipulation was signed the general creditors of Richfield Oil Co. are threatening to object at the court hearing on confirmation of the stipulation unless this provision be modified so as to provide that the increase in the claim against Richfield Oil Co. on this account shall not exceed $380,000.

In our conferences reference has been made to an agreement by the Petroleum Securities Co. (Mr. Doheny's family corporation), given at the time it sold the control of Pan American Western Petroleum Co. to Richfield Oil Co. that it would indemnify the Richfield Oil Co. in an amount not exceeding $1,000,000, if the Government should be successful in this suit and Pan American Petroleum Co. should pay the judgment in full. The receiver of the Richfield Oil Co. is considering bringing a suit against the Petroleum Securities Co. upon that guaranty. If he brings suit and recovers, the proceeds will swell the unmortgaged assets of Richfield Oil Co. so that the Government will receive an indirect benefit insofar as that additional asset may increase the dividend upon the claim of Pan American Petroleum Co. against Richfield Oil Co. and upon the compromise of the direct liability of Richfield Oil Co. to the United States ($408,000 preferred or $2,720,000 general claim of the United States against Richfield Oil Co.), but the United States will not be entitled to the entire proceeds of any recovery from Petroleum Securities Co. upon that indemnity agreement.

There has been some discussion of the fact that the Standard Oil Co., if it acquires these assets will strengthen its position in the oil trade of the Pacific coast. We are advised that even after acquiring the Richfield Oil Co. business, the Standard Oil Co. would only have approximately 33⅓ percent of the Pacific coast business. As you know there are a great many other oil companies operating on the Pacific coast, including the Shell Oil Co., the Union Oil Co., the Associated Oil Co., the General Petroleum Co., etc. But a conclusive answer to any objection to the United States being a party to any plan based upon an offer of the Standard Oil Co. is that before the business can be acquired by the Standard Oil Co., the assets at the foundation of the business will have to be sold at public auction. There is no way to prevent the Standard Oil Co. causing the highest bid to be made at such public auction. We are making no agreement that will prevent any other party from outbidding the reorganization committees and thereby cutting off the Standard Oil Co.

The willingness and ability of the Standard Oil Co. to make a definite arrangement is a great advantage to the Government in the collection of its judgment against the Pan American Petroleum Co. If it were not for the Standard Oil Co. offer, there would be no way of insuring the payment of the claims of Pan American Petroleum Co. against Richfield Co., or the payment of the direct claims of the Government against Richfield Oil Co. All parties familiar with the oil industry of the Pacific coast, including the receiver of these companies, Capt. H. A. Stuart, and Judge James, fear that without the Standard Oil Co. offer the properties would have to be dismembered and sold piecemeal in bankruptcy with the probable result of a very small recovery.

Capt. H. A. Stuart and his assistant, Lt. Thomas J. Kelly, participated in all our negotiations and are very much pleased with and strongly recommend the settlement.

Considering the fact that the bondholders of the Richfield Oil Co. only expect a dividend of 30 percent, the unsecured bank and trade creditors of the Richfield Oil Co. a dividend of 12 percent, and the bondholders of Pan American Petroleum Co. a dividend of 40 percent, whereas the Government is assured of more than 50 percent, with the possibility of an increase resulting from the allowance of an income-tax refund and a recovery against Mr. Doheny, we have no hesitancy in urging with all the force at our command the earliest possible approval of the stipulation and the collateral understanding with the Standard Oil Co.

H. J. CRAWFORD,
FRANK HARRISON,
Special Assistants to the Attorney General.

Approved.

ATLEE POMERENE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that Senate Joint Resolution 13 be taken up for immediate consideration? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 13) authorizing the Attorney General, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Navy, to release claims of the United States upon certain assets of the Pan American Petroleum Co. and the Richfield Oil Co. of California and others in connection with collections upon a certain judgment in favor of the United States against the Pan American Petroleum Co. heretofore duly entered, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Attorney General of the United States, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Navy, be, and he is hereby, authorized, in connection with collection of amounts due the United States of America under a certain judgment for $9,277,666.17 entered in the office of the clerk of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California at Los Angeles on January 14, 1933, against the Pan American Petroleum Co., a corporation, to release from claim or lien under said judgment such part or portions of the property and assets of the said Pan American Petroleum Co. and the Richfield Oil Co. of California, in such manner and with such reservations as shall seem to him proper and advisable, in consideration of payments to the United States to apply upon said judgment, of not less than the sum of $5,000,000, and in connection therewith to release any claims of the United States against purchasers of oil and petroleum products from the leases commonly known as "E", "I", and "G" leases, or also known as Visalia 010042, 010043, and 010097 leases in naval petroleum reserve no. 1, Kern County, Calif., and to consent, in the premises, to the assignment of other oil and gas leases in said naval petroleum reserve no. 1, now part of the unmortgaged assets of Pan American Petroleum Co., with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Navy, and to the assignment of other oil and gas leases, also part of the unmortgaged assets of Pan American Petroleum Co., of the United States outside the said naval petroleum reserve no. 1, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, said assignments to be authorized only to assignees otherwise duly qualified under existing laws.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Dakota if this joint resolution yields or disposes of any substantial right on the part of the Government?

Mr. NYE. The Attorney General, in his letter to the committee of last February, declared that the stipulation which is involved now, involving the sale of certain properties of the Richfield and Pan American Oil Cos., would not compromise the judgment in any way. The Senator will find that language of the Attorney General in the report on page 3.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I assume from the statement just made by the Senator from North Dakota that it would not impair the prospect of the Government recovering its judgment.

Mr. NYE. Not at all; and, quite to the contrary, it would largely improve the chance of the Government's realizing something resembling the full amount of the judgment which it enjoys.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS RELATIVE TO VETERANS' RELIEF (S.DOC. NO. 10)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Pursuant to the provision of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith a photostat copy of Executive orders embodying the regulations approved March 31, 1933, relating to veterans' relief, which have been issued in accordance with the terms of title I of that law.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 4, 1933.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message and accompanying documents will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the accompanying documents will be printed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that is the ordinary custom.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there will be a very great demand for copies of these particular documents. The Chairman of the Committee on Printing is here, and I would suggest that an order be entered that they be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does the Senator mean there will be a great demand now or a year from next November?

Mr. REED. Probably all of next year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator desire this matter printed in the RECORD and as a document also?

Mr. REED. No; I think it is scarcely as useful to print it in the RECORD as it is to print it as a separate Senate document, which we can all send out in answer to inquiries.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator that I am informed by the printing clerk that it is customary to print all messages of the President in document form, and that a large number of these documents will be ordered for general distribution.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the unfinished business.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] reads in part as follows:

Provided, This section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character.

I should like to strike out the period after the word "character" and insert a comma and add the words "nor to newspapers and periodicals."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] was adopted?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to change that amendment. I simply want to add these words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that the amendment of the Senator from Washington having been adopted by action of the Senate, it will be necessary to reconsider that vote before the amendment of the Senator from Maryland can be considered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Washington I think the Senator from Maryland might make his motion and let it be pending, and not undertake to dispose of it now. We can easily dispose of it tomorrow; and I anticipate that if it is merely to add something to the amendment, the opportunity will be given the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I hope he will not ask to reconsider the vote on this amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I will not. I think we can work it out without that being done; and, if I may add just a brief word, so that the RECORD will show the purpose of this proposal, it is thought by some that the making of a newspaper is the manufacturing of a product. I understand from the author of the bill that he does not feel that newspapers are included in the text; but in order to make doubly sure I should like to have the amendment incorporated in the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Senator can offer it as an independent amendment at whatever place in the bill he would like to have it inserted.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, if that is in order, I should like to have pending, to be inserted at the proper place, an amendment, as follows:

Nothing in this act shall apply to the manufacture or production of newspapers or periodicals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the amendment? The author of the bill is here.

Mr. BLACK. I have stated that we did not intend to include newspapers.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have stated to some Members who are now absent that no action would be taken today upon the bill or any amendment relating to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I ask that the amendment be pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 4, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, bless us with that inward stillness until we cease any imperfect thinking. In singleness of heart may we wait to know Thy will and to apprehend both the need of our country and the obligation which that need imposes. Let us have the assurance of the right way, and also of that quality of life and action that shall lead us to the Master and to our God. Inspire this Congress to lift up a standard for all the people in every section of our beloved land, and Thine shall be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the bill (H.R. 3342) entitled "An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes", disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. CAREY to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1934

Mr. CANNON of Missouri, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H.R. 4589) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order.

THE ECONOMY BILL

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD by inserting a synopsis of the regulations on veterans' bill that was passed the other day. It was compiled or worked out by a representative of the Disabled Veterans of the World War and merely gives information as to the effect of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS, MUNSEY BUILDING,
Washington, D.C., April 3, 1933.

BULLETIN ON NEW UNITED STATES RELIEF POLICY FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS. (ACT MAR. 20 AND PRESIDENT'S REGULATIONS APR. 1, 1933)

All present payments will cease on July 1, next, except on claims of widows and orphans which must be reviewed to establish whether eligible under new 1-year presumption.

"Compensation" and "disability allowance" are terms not in the act of March 20, as the whole system of direct financial relief is classified as "pension."

There is a rebuttable presumption of soundness at enlistment but such veteran must have served 90 days in the military service.

There is 1 year's presumption for service connection of chronic diseases, provided the veteran served 90 days.

Misconduct cases are generally excluded from pensions but permitted hospitalization under certain conditions.

Compensation will be paid where a preexisting disease was aggravated unless there is a specific finding that the increase in disability was due to the natural progress of the disease.

Where the service connection is granted, the payment of pension will be as follows: Ten percent, $8; 25 percent, $20; 50 percent, $40; 75 percent, $60; P.T., $80; with an additional allowance of $20 per month for the anatomical loss of 1 foot, 1 hand, or 1 eye.

Where there is a loss of 2 limbs or the veteran is so helpless as to be in need of an attendant, the pension shall be $100. Where there is a loss of 2 hands and 1 foot, or 2 feet and 1 hand, the monthly pension shall be $150. For blindness in both eyes, with only light perception, $175 per month. For blindness in both eyes, only light perception; loss of 1 hand or 1 foot, $200 per month. For the loss of both feet or both hands and is blind in both eyes, $250 per month.

The rate of death pension to dependents of service-connected veterans is unchanged.

There is a payment of $20 per month on non-service-connected veterans who served 90 days or more and who are permanently and totally disabled. Enlistment for this class must have been between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and those are not eligible if they paid income tax preceding year.

No retroactive payments will be made prior to the date of filing claim.

Dependency compensation to children will terminate at 16 years of age, unless the child is totally incapacitated for self-support.

No dependency payments will be made to father or mother where the dependency arises 10 years after the death of the veteran.

Application on appeals must be made within 6 months after initial adverse action. Where a case is denied in part, appeal must be made within 60 days.

All ratings will be based on average impairment of earning capacity resulting from similar injuries in civil occupation.

Emergency officers now on retired list will be retained providing they served between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and that such service was the "causative factor" of the present disability.

Hospital treatment will be granted for service-connected disabilities.

Destitute persons who served 90 days and are suffering from permanent and total disabilities, of tuberculosis, neuropsychopathy, and ailments which wholly incapacitate them will be hospitalized.

Clothing will be furnished to veterans hospitalized only where they are indigent and clothing is necessary to protect health and sanitation.

Transportation may be furnished to and from hospitals for service-connected disability, but to no other classes.

Where a veteran dies in a hospital of a service-connected disability, payment for transportation of the body to a national cemetery or the veteran's home may be paid in the discretion of the Administration.

No veteran shall receive domiciliary or medical care who resides outside of the United States.

The maximum amount payable to a man without dependents receiving institutional care is $15 per month.

The Administrator is authorized to apportion pensions to dependents.

The Administrator may furnish orthopedic appliances to veterans suffering service-connected disabilities.

Where a veteran is receiving yearly renewable term insurance payments and the award is terminated the insured shall be entitled to convert the amount thereof to any other form of Government insurance. The insured has 30 days in which to make this conversion after notice of his right.

No claim for yearly renewable term insurance will be considered except where payments are now being made or where suit was filed prior to March 20, 1933.

Payment, not to exceed $75, for funeral expenses of honorably discharged veterans is allowed, except where the veteran's net assets exceed $75.

Claims for reimbursement of burial allowance must be made within 1 year.

The World War is considered as beginning April 6, 1917, and ending November 11, 1918, except for those serving in Russia, in which case April 1, 1920, is the closing date.

The term "wife" or "widow" of a World War veteran is a person who was married to the veteran prior to July 3, 1931.

Where the injury or disease occurred while on leave, the burden of proof shall be on the claimant to show that it was in line of duty. Where the disability occurred while at camp or post, the burden shall be upon the Government to show the disability was not in line of duty.

No person holding position under the United States Government or the District of Columbia shall be paid a pension or retirement while in such employment, except where the pay is for disability actually incurred in combat. Persons so employed will receive $6 per month for directly service-connected disabilities when such disabilities are not a result of combat.

Where a person receiving pension or retirement pay who resides outside of the continental limits of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, Hawaii, and the Panama Canal Zone, shall not receive more than 50 percent of the amount otherwise due.

The veteran may grant Disabled American Veterans, American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, or other recognized service organizations written power of attorney to act as his representative to present his claim, but only one such authorization will be allowed in each case.

No person receiving monetary benefits from the Administration will be permitted to sit on a rating board to determine the rights of another person to receive such benefits. Indications are that adjudicators and authorizers will also be barred.

The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may enter into a contract in emergency cases for hospitalization of veterans suffering with service-connected disabilities.

All information concerning a veteran and his claim shall be deemed confidential, except the President is authorized, at his discretion, to make public information concerning actual beneficiaries.

While attorneys may represent veterans in claims before the Administration, these lawyers will be barred from inspection of files and drastically limited as to fees, expenses, and other financial allowances.

All but a few of the larger Veterans' Administration offices in the field will be gradually closed before July 1, 1934, and practically all activities, except hospitals and homes, will be centralized in Washington.

Present plans call for indefinite continuance of diagnostic centers at Washington, Chicago, and San Francisco.

All intermediary boards of appeal have been discontinued, and the only appeal will be from a regional office on final action at Washington.

It is planned to abandon all beds outside of Veterans' Administration facilities as fast as feasible.

All statements as to retention, transfer, or surplusing of Administration personnel are at present purely speculative, although it is expected that thousands of present employees will be disposed of within the next 6 months.

All World War awards, compensation, disability allowances, insurance, retirement, and dependency will be reviewed as fast as practicable and the new law applied.

Indications are that the $50 award for arrested tuberculosis will be continued for 5 years after arrest, $25 for second 5 years after arrest, and then dropped from the rolls unless there is a reactivation, when same plan will be repeated.

Men in hospitals for service-connected disabilities will not be automatically rated total while in hospital but will be paid for actual degree of disability.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

THE AMERICAN LEGION SUPPORTS THE PRESIDENT

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, when the economy bill was under consideration several days ago, I inserted in the RECORD a brief paragraph from the statement issued by the national commander of the American Legion. The complete statement is very short, and I now ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting the statement of the national commander in full.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following message of Louis Johnson, National Commander of the American Legion:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., March —.—Louis Johnson, national commander of the American Legion, has issued the following message to the 10,709 posts of the Legion, calling upon them to support the President of the United States:

"On the day following the new President's inaugural oath I pledged the million men of the American Legion to give their utmost loyalty and help in the complex and difficult problems now facing the Chief Executive. I stated then, in a nation-wide broadcast in which the President participated, that the American Legion wants nothing more than to be of service to America in this situation as our members were in 1917–18.

"The time to render that service has arrived. Congress has given to the President the authority to put into effect the economies the President believes necessary to restore the financial stability of our country. This new legislation is fraught with gravest consequences to the disabled veteran. The President, under the authority given him, has powers of life and death over thousands of men who once gladly offered their lives in a period of national emergency.

"The Legion has every faith in the discretion, fairness, and the justice with which the President will deal with this problem, involving as it does in many instances the need for compassion and mercy.

"The President needs the support of every loyal American, and today I am calling upon the 10,709 Legion posts and our 1,000,000 members throughout our great organization to uphold the pledge that I have made as the national commander of the American Legion. I am asking that special meetings be held by every Legion post where it will officially express, by a resolution, such loyalty and utmost help. Many of our posts already have taken the initiative and set dates for such meetings.

"In addition, I am tendering to the President of the United States the benefit of exhaustive studies the Legion has made throughout the years and the entire facilities of the Legion's national rehabilitation committee, that he may have direct contact with and the expert advice and experience of these American Legion officials who have devoted their lives to the rehabilitation of the disabled veterans of the World War.

"There is no question of Legion loyalty. The patriotism of every member has been proved in his war service and in his peacetime devotion to the welfare of our country, as evidenced by his membership in the Legion. In this hour of emergency we are but eager to serve the Stars and Stripes again under whatever orders our new Commander in Chief may give. Many may disagree with the new law, but now in this crisis we must take his orders. We have never asked anything for ourselves but what we felt was just and what was first proposed by the American people through their Representatives in Congress. We have fought long and hard for the proper care of our disabled comrades, and they will always remain our first and greatest obligation, save only God and Country.

"Our President is confronted with problems as great as ever faced the Chief Executive of the United States at the beginning of his administration. He has not faltered in action needed as he sees it. Like a brave soldier in battle, he is giving unstintingly of himself. Yet, with all his leadership and fine courage, he cannot win the war on the depression, and he cannot lead us back to the mountain tops unless all citizens accord him their utmost help. The need for patriotism is as urgent today as it was in 1917–18. Our Nation needs a reawakened spirit of unity and confidence. Our citizens need a reinspired willingness to follow the leadershp of our duly-elected Chief Executive. The American Legionnaire is that kind of a citizen, and it is the purpose of our organization to set an example for all citizens to follow in giving to our President and Government our utmost faith and assistance whenever it is needed and whatever the necessary cost in sacrifice may be, including life itself.

"I again pledge the Legion to fulfill its preamble declaration of service to God and Country, and to 'keep on keeping on.'

"LOUIS JOHNSON,
"National Commander the American Legion."

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that, pursuant to authority conferred upon him by House Resolution 89, he did, on March 30, 1933, sign the enrolled bill of the Senate (S. 598) for the relief of unemployment through the performance of useful public work, and for other purposes; and, on March 31, 1933, the enrolled bill of the Senate (S. 562) relating to the prescribing of medicinal liquors.

THE WAGNER BILL—PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, if necessary, I now call up the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House Resolution 91

Resolved, That Senate 812, in the opinion of this House, contravenes the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and is an infringement of the privileges of this House, and that the said bill be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to say this much, the resolution, in my opinion, involves much more than a question of procedure insofar as this bill is concerned. It may involve considerable delay, and it might jeopardize the passage of the legislation in its present form, if the House should adopt the resolution and send it back to the Senate and a controversy should arise between the House and the Senate as to whether or not the House is justified in passing such a resolution.

Personally, I am frank to say, I am not satisfied that the bill in question is a revenue measure; but, aside from this, it strikes me that the best thing to do is to send the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary and let that committee investigate the whole proposition, since it is a question of whether or not the provision of the Constitution has been violated by the Senate in passing this particular bill. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I am desirous of knowing what shape the bill would be in in case this procedure were followed. Will the bill be referred to the proper committee so that it may go ahead and work on the measure or is it the gentleman's purpose to have a similar bill introduced in the House and permit the committee to work on that?

Mr. BYRNS. I want to be entirely frank. It would be my idea that this action of the House, if consented to, would not serve to delay consieration of the so-called "Wagner bill", but we would have a thorough investigation of this matter by the law committee of the House, with a view to further action.

Mr. RAGON. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the consideration of the Wagner bill?

Mr. BYRNS. It has been suggested—and I think it is a wise suggestion—that the proper committee of the House may consider the House bill, pending action on this resolution. In the meantime the Senate bill can remain on the Speaker's desk.

Mr. RAGON. There is no similar House bill.

Mr. BYRNS. If that be true, someone can introduce the bill. If no one else does, I shall introduce it myself.

Mr. SNELL. I understand a similar House bill has already been introduced.

Mr. BYRNS. The Senate bill may then stay on the Speaker's table pending such consideration.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that a similar House bill having been introduced or about to be introduced shall be taken up by the Ways and Means Committee pending the time the Committee on the Judiciary is giving a decision on the resolution as to whether or not we are within our province in declining to receive the Senate bill?

Mr. BYRNS. It has been suggested that there might be a question whether the Ways and Means Committee would be the committee to have jurisdiction. That is a question for the Speaker.

Mr. TREADWAY. In that connection there was the question of an additional authority for $500,000,000, which went to the Ways and Means Committee in the Garner bill last session.

Mr. BYRNS. That is a remark the gentleman should address to the Speaker, who will have the decision of that question.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want it distinctly understood that if unanimous consent is granted in this case, it is on the condition that the Judiciary Committee is to take up the subject matter on the merits of the resolution——

Mr. BYRNS. That is my request.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I trust that this motion is not going to establish a precedent that any time any Member raises such a point of order by way of resolution that the House must refer it to the Judiciary Committee. It seems to me there is no basis whatever for the point of order raised by the minority leader [Mr. SNELL].

Furthermore, the Speaker decides points of order in the House, and in this particular instance of constitutional jurisdiction the House itself can, if at any time it does not agree with the Speaker, overrule him. But, if you are establishing a precedent of sending it to the Judiciary Committee to come back and advise the House, I think it is an extremely bad precedent to establish. It is a question of rules rather than law; and I think, if you must refer it, the Rules Committee could better decide the parliamentary question involved.

Mr. BYRNS. I am in accord with the gentleman, but I question very seriously whether or not it can be called a precedent. This is not a point of order, it is a highly privileged resolution which the gentleman from Massachusetts introduced, and it involves a question of constitutional law that the Speaker cannot pass upon. It is necessary for the House to pass upon the resolution, and it is my idea that the House should have an opportunity to investigate the whole subject, and it would infinitely prefer that the Committee on the Judiciary make some recommendation before it was called upon to decide it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Right there let me ask, if any time a bill comes from the Senate which some Member thinks raises revenue in violation of the constitutional provision and he introduces a resolution, do I understand that resolution must be referred to the Judiciary Committee to consider it?

Mr. BYRNS. Not necessarily, but it seemed to me that it would be infinitely better, as I have said, for the Judiciary Committee, since it involves a question of constitutional law, to make an investigation and report tomorrow or as soon as may be, their conclusions as to whether or not the action of the Senate violated the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Must we wait on that, when an emergency confronts us?

Mr. BYRNS. I have asked unanimous consent for the reasons stated. Of course, any Member can forestall that.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that whatever ruling is brought back here, whether the House sustains the Committee on the Judiciary, or overrules it, it will therefore constitute a precedent which the Speaker can follow hereafter. As I understand it that is exactly what the gentleman is trying to do. I do not take the same position that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] takes. I say this, if the Senate has a right to originate this bill, then they have a right to originate an appropriation bill for every department. This is even a stronger case—and I say this so that Members may have it in mind later—than the matter of appropriations, because it visits a charge on the Treasury of a bond issue. Yet we are very jealous to have the House originate appropriation bills.

Mr. BYRNS. Without going into an argument about it, it may be seriously questioned as to whether it creates an obligation upon the Treasury through a bond issue, because it is expected that these bonds will be satisfied without calling upon the Treasury.

Mr. RAGON. But primarily they get their strength from the Treasury.

Mr. BYRNS. That is true. I have assumed that other Members feel about the matter just as I do. I know that it is a highly controversial matter. For my part I would rather, before I vote on the resolution, have the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary as to whether or not in its judgment the initiation of this legislation in the Senate did violate the Constitution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I brought this matter up yesterday with all honesty of purpose, because I desired to protect the rights and prerogatives of the House in this matter. All that I am desirous of is simply to get as fair a decision upon the proposition as we possibly can at this time. So far as I am concerned, it was not to delay the legislation, whether I support it finally or not. I am perfectly willing to yield to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary and let us have a fair and deliberate consideration of the matter, a more deliberate consideration than you could possibly have on the floor at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement in connection with this matter. I shall not oppose the request of the majority leader with reference to the action that he desires on this proposition, but I do want to preserve in the RECORD what I conceive to be a proper interpretation of this situation. In its last analysis, by the very nature of the case, this is a parliamentary question. The resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] raises the specific, parliamentary question, not a judicial question, as to whether or not the bill now under discussion violates that section of the Constitution providing that all bills raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. I do not know how long the Committee on the Judiciary would undertake to consider this matter, or what their report might be; but whatever report they bring back to this House, we must certainly pass our individual judgment on the interpretation of this proposition. That is all that is involved here. Personally I regret that the issue is not directly submitted to the House for its determination now, because there can be only one question finally submitted to the House, and that is the proposition of whether or not this Senate bill violates that section of the Constitution, and any Member of the House, even a nonexpert on these questions of parliamentary construction, in my opinion, after an examination of that bill and of the precedents and of the principles involved, cannot reasonably come to the conclusion that the bill provides for the raising of revenue. In my opinion the minority leader would not undertake to say on his responsibility that he is clear, even in his own mind, that it does undertake to do that thing.

Mr. SNELL. From any study that I have been able to make, and I have spent considerable time upon it, I am firmly convinced that it has to do with the raising of revenue.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is an honest difference of opinion which I shall not discuss now, but I think if I had the opportunity I could convince the Members of the House that it is not. We have had this question here before.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, it has been raised a thousand times.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman stated two specific precedents, in which there did not appear to be any twilight zone on this proposition, and I think properly presented a question of the privileges of the House, but it seems to me that in its last analysis the only proposition we will have to pass on when it comes here, either by a favorable or an adverse report from the Committee on the Judiciary, is the one distinct and specific proposition I have referred to, and that the House will have to pass on.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are the gravest reasons why this matter should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary as it has been in the past at least once and perhaps at other times when raised. Even the greatest exigency ought not to allow us to pass judgment hastily and without due consideration on such a constitutional question. An issue of the same sort was raised in 1837, when the Secretary of the Treasury reported that he could not raise specie on a draft for $811. Gentlemen perhaps are unfamiliar with the fact that the crisis then was more severe, and the need for haste more imperative than now. Nevertheless John Quincy Adams rose and objected to the consideration of a revenue bill that had been originated in the Senate, and the House, rather than decide the question, substituted a House bill to the same end.

Long before that issue was raised yesterday I had occasion to make a somewhat thorough study of the problem and found it be one of the most important problems in matter of political theory that can confront the House. Decision that the House of Commons should originate money bills was reached conclusively in the time of William of Orange. The liberties of the English-speaking people were then believed to be dependent upon the issue, and it was decided in favor of their representatives.

In the American Colonies the power of the purse was the chief bone of contention between the governors of the assemblies rather than between two legislative branches, but out of their quarrels came the belief that the right to control taxation and expenditure was one of the most precious guaranties of liberty, and it may fairly be said to have been the most potent cause of revolution.

In our Constitutional Convention of 1787 this question was the rock upon which the Convention came near splitting. In the darkest hours of that assembly, when it seemed as if no constitution could be framed, Benjamin Franklin rose and, stating the issue, pleaded for compromise. In the Congress of the Confederation, which had carried on the Revolutionary War, and then had proved so inadequate that a new frame of government was hoped for, and in the Convention itself, voting was by States, giving large and small an equal voice. Should the Congress to be created be framed on that basis or should relative populations be taken into account? Franklin said: "The diversity of opinion turns on two points. If a proportional representation takes place, the small States contend that their liberties will be in danger. If an equality of votes be put in its place, the larger States say their money will be in danger."

In the end compromise was reached by yielding to the small States equal representation in the Senate and to the large States representation in the House of Representatives on the basis of population, with the exclusive right for the House to originate what were most frequently spoken of as "money bills", the power of the purse.

That compromise was what enabled this Nation to be created.

Now, when an issue of such gravity arises, the proper procedure is a matter of supreme importance. I have found but one precedent in all the times when this issue has been raised, when the House did an unwise thing. In 1874 the question came up unexpectedly, and incidental to another, and the parliamentary situation was such that there was no debate. The issue was not squarely laid before the House. James A. Garfield, afterward President of the United States, who had written an exhaustive and admirable discussion of the question 3 years earlier, tried to get the floor. A division had been started, and he was unable to present any argument. So, without deliberation, without debate, without knowledge, the House took a dangerous and unwise step. This single precedent, in a matter where opinion is so sharply divided, where the issue can be presented with such force on either side, an issue that this House has never dared to determine, an issue that the Senate has never dared to determine, where each body in every instance except the one to which I have referred, has evaded definite conclusion, ought not to bind. This issue ought now be settled once and for all, in spite of exigency, in order that we may know whether the bargain by which this Nation was created, shall still be kept. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state for the information of the House that an identical House bill has been introduced and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Senate bill will remain on the Speaker's desk.

The unfinished business is the disposition of the President's message.

REFINANCING OF FARM-MORTGAGE INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the President's message be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is my purpose to offer a substitute for the motion submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. I wish to inquire whether I should make that motion now or make it later?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, what is the resolution before the House now?

The SPEAKER. A motion to refer the President's message to the Committee on Agriculture is now before the House.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the Speaker would state what the resolution is.

The SPEAKER. It is the President's message on the farm mortgage bill, which was read to the House on yesterday. Today it is the unfinished business on the Speaker's desk, and the gentleman from Texas has moved to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture.

The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make this suggestion in connection with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama: The motion which I have made makes a clear-cut issue of submitting this message to the Committee on Agriculture. It can be voted up or voted down. If it is voted down, I will join with the gentleman from Alabama in asking that the message be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, but I believe we ought to vote on the straight issue and not have it confused with other motions.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire at the proper time to submit a substitute motion that the message be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas does not yield. It is necessary to vote down the previous question before that motion will be in order.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a further parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for that purpose. I will yield time to the gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair not recognize me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the gentleman from Texas yields for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the matter of reference is the function of the Speaker of the House; that only the Speaker of the House has the right to refer a message or bill to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The House is the supreme court in that matter. The House can exercise its right.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, my inquiry is whether or not I may submit a substitute motion.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question is voted down, if that should occur, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama to make such a motion.

Mr. STEAGALL. Then I desire to submit an inquiry with reference to the debate on this question. I assume there can be no desire to preclude discussion of this question, and I would like to submit a request that whatever time the gentleman from Texas has may likewise be allowed to the other side of the question.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the gentleman that I will yield him as much time as I use, and I have an hour.

Mr. STEAGALL. Then let me submit a unanimous-consent request, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Texas have a like amount of time, to be controlled by those opposed to the motion.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, to this I shall have to object, because this would make me lose control of the floor. I will yield the gentleman from Alabama fully as much time as I may use in the discussion of this motion.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman if we are to understand from his statement that he is to have 30 minutes under his control and I may have 30 minutes under my control?

Mr. JONES. Before my time starts to run, will the Speaker inform me if I may be permitted to yield time to the gentleman, which he in turn may yield to others, without my yielding the floor?

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit to the House, if I may, the request that those opposed to the motion be accorded the same amount of time as that given to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to yield as much as 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, with the privilege on his part of yielding to others, without my yielding the floor in any event.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. When the gentleman from Alabama offers a substitute, will he not have an hour on his substitute, just as the gentleman from Texas on the original motion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. STEAGALL. Then are we to understand that the gentleman from Texas has 1 hour and I have 1 hour?

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman from Texas has an hour. He may dispose of it as he pleases.

The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to yield as much as one half of his hour to the gentleman from Alabama, the gentleman from Alabama to reyield the time, with the understanding that the gentleman from Texas does not lose control of the floor and has the right to move the previous question at the expiration of his hour. Is there objection?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FULLER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, the President's message of yesterday covers the whole field of farm credits, not only farm mortgages but farm credits. He stated in that message:

> I ask the Congress for specific legislation relating to mortgage and other forms of indebtedness of the farmers of the Nation.

The message covers the different forms of credit for agriculture.

A tremendous issue is involved in the disposition of this message. It will cover probably not only the bill that is to follow, in this particular instance covering farm mortgages, but every form of farm credits that may hereafter issue.

We will have on the effective date of an Executive order a completely different control from what has heretofore existed. So precedents that may have been decided heretofore can have no bearing in the set-up of the future.

I hold in my hand the Executive order which covers all forms of agricultural credits. It covers the old Farm Board which was abolished, but its machinery is used as the nucleus for several different forms of credit issuing out of the farm-credit administration. This covers not only farm mortgages, which will be involved in the bill immediately to follow, but it covers crop-production loans which have heretofore been handled by the Committee on Agriculture. It covers the Federal land banks heretofore handled by the Committee on Banking. It covers the cooperative credits heretofore handled by the Committee on Agriculture. It covers the emergency loans—the whole range, the entire range of farm credit. True, this will not be effective until the end of 60 days, but, as everyone knows, they are going ahead under this order and there is going to be no disposition to resist it.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. To what Executive order does the gentleman refer?

Mr. JONES. To the Executive order of the President, Document No. 7, issued March 27, 1933, combining the different lending agencies making loans to agriculture, covering not only what has heretofore been handled by the Committee on Banking and Currency but also what has heretofore been handled by the Committee on Agriculture, and even by other committees.

I merely mention this to give the House the background. As a matter of fact, there is something far more fundamental, far more important, than the mere technical forms that are involved here. I think, inasmuch as we are deciding a policy, that the Speaker wisely submitted it to the House, for the House may now determine this legislation in the sense of the way it ought to be determined, and that is what I ask this House to do.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is suggesting, if I understand him correctly, the organization of a new committee of the House on farm credits.

Mr. JONES. No; not at all. The President's Executive order, which may be obtained from the House document room, has already established a farm credit administration. It will handle not only farm mortgages but all kinds of agricultural credit. Now, what committee ought to handle this? I submit to you that this is the most important issue for agriculture, the most important vote on agriculture anybody in this House has ever been called upon to cast; and it is the most important vote I ever expect to cast in this House, because it involves the very heart and life of agriculture.

If it were merely handling this bill, I would not be so interested. But other measures will follow through the years. Who will handle these? When jurisdiction is started in a new set-up it follows logically ever after. It is the future that I have in mind.

My one ambition is to have a system of financing agriculture outside of the regular commercial banking channels. [Applause.] High interest rates have long been the curse of agriculture, as well as high freight rates and other discriminations. I want to unshackle and set agriculture free. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As I understand, the gentleman is now emphasizing the difference that exists between agricultural credits and banking credits, in that they are entirely foreign, separate, and distinct.

Mr. JONES. They are entirely separate and distinct. A different form of credit is necessary.

I have a high regard for the members of the Banking and Currency Committee. There are very many things they need to do and are doing. It is a very busy committee. They have the whole Federal Reserve System, the matter of the gold content of the dollar, the matter of the issue of currency, the carrying out of the President's suggestion in his original message that we should have an adequate currency on a sound basis. There are tremendous problems which that committee needs to handle, including the question of a bank guaranty and other matters that are of great importance.

The Committee on Agriculture, if this is assigned to its jurisdiction, will go to work immediately on its program. The committee will have in mind what is most vital to agriculture, and I assure you that the different members will study this problem thoroughly, both now and in the future.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. For a question; yes.

Mr. DIES. Has the gentleman's committee given any study to the question of the refinancing of farm mortgages?

Mr. JONES. Yes; we have devoted considerable study to that question. As a matter of fact, one of the bills in the last session was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. At my special request they secured bills that had gone to other committees. Our committee has given a good deal of study to this question.

As I stated originally, the message covers the whole field of farm credits, and the question of the immediate bill and its terms is but an incident. The terms may be changed or a substitute bill may be presented. The question, on first impression, is a question of who should have jurisdiction of credits that are vital to agriculture and that require a different form and a different system of credits.

I do not want those who handle the commercial credits of America to dictate the policies with respect to how the financing of agriculture shall be maintained.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker, and yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. I regret that this matter has been thrust into the House, but the Committee on Banking and Currency has asked that proper steps be taken to preserve the integrity of its jurisdiction and the integrity of the procedure of this House.

Let us see what the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency is under the provisions of the rules of the House.

I quote from the Manual:

It has reported on subjects relating to the strengthening of public credit, issues of notes and taxation and redemption thereof, propositions to maintain the parity of the money of the United States, the issue of silver certificates as currency, national banks and current deposits of public money, the incorporation of an international bank, subjects relating to the Federal Reserve System, Farm Loan Act, home loan bills, stabilization of the dollar, War Finance Corporation, and Federal Reserve bank buildings.

I quote again:

The Committee on Agriculture was established in 1820. In 1880 the subject of forestry was added to its jurisdiction and at the same time the authority to receive the estimates and report appropriations was conferred, but on July 1, 1920, authority to report appropriations for the Department of Agriculture was transferred to the Committee on Appropriations. It has had jurisdiction of bills for establishing and regulating the Department of Agriculture, for inspection of livestock and meat products, regulation of animal industry, diseases of animals, adulteration of seeds, insect pests, protection of birds and animals in forest reserves, the improvement of breed of horses, even horses in the Cavalry service.

I invite the attention of the Membership of the House to the provisions of the rules fixing the jurisdiction of these two committees.

Mr. Speaker, every line of the bill that is to follow the President's message providing for a readjustment of the farm-mortgage indebtedness of the United States relates to the Federal Farm Loan Act, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, or to a method of getting money out of the Treasury of the United States in the form of advancement to the banks established under one of these acts. Every one of these agencies was established under legislation which was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There is not one line in this bill that deals with anything fundamental to agriculture. The bill from one end to the other is a credit bill, and there is not the slightest basis for the contention that it relates to agriculture save in that particular.

The set-up to which the gentleman refers and which becomes effective 60 days after the President's consolidation order—which the gentleman admits is not effective now—and which is the sole basis for bringing this question into the House. There is not a provision in the bill that does not relate to the subject of credit.

There is a possible basis for the contention that this bill should go to the Ways and Means Committee, because there is in the bill a provision that obligates the Treasury of the United States directly in the amount of $2,000,000,000 surety on bonds to be used by the Federal land banks for the purpose of refinancing land mortgages.

But there is not the slightest logical basis, under the provisions of the bill, and the precedents of the House unbroken for a long period of years, to remove the jurisdiction of this legislation.

Now, it is true that there is to be a new set-up of the machinery that is handling agricultural credits in the United States. The man who is at the head of this credit agency is to take the place of the president or head of the Federal Farm Board.

The Federal Farm Board itself was not created under any credit act of Congress, but it was established under the Marketing Act and so referred to at all times. It was not a credit proposition.

The powers of the Federal Farm Loan Board which superintended the Federal land banks and the joint-stock land banks have become merged in the Farm Loan Commissioner, and all authority of the Federal Farm Loan Board has been conferred on the Farm Loan Commissioner, who is to be a part of the new set-up.

That is only a method for creating the credit machinery to be used in carrying out this legislation. It does not matter whether these facilities are to be handled by the land banks or the joint-stock banks or under the Farm Board administration—it is essentially a credit proposition—the same kind of credit legislation that has always been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

We might just as well contend that the act providing a method by which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could make loans and advances to railroads should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee, because the Interstate Commerce Committee has jurisdiction of legislation relating to interstate commerce and general railroad problems.

The bill is no more a relief measure for agriculture than the bill authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to go to the relief of railroads is a railroad bill.

This bill was referred in the Senate to the Banking and Currency Committee. Our former beloved Speaker of this House referred the bill in the Senate to the Banking and Currency Committee, and it is being considered now by that committee.

I was in repeated conferences in the office of one of the Senators on several occasions when this legislation was discussed. In every one of those meetings it was suggested that the bill be introduced in the Senate and referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, and that I should introduce the bill in the House and that it should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The bill was sent to me yesterday morning with my name on it, with the proper reference in pursuance of the agreement entered into at every one of these conferences.

There was a conference at the White House when the gentleman from Texas was there; and certainly he was at most of the conferences. At the White House it was specifically stated that the bill should be introduced in the House by me and referred to the Banking and Currency Committee.

Only in the last conference—on Friday night of last week—did the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] suggest that after the new set-up consolidating agricultural agencies goes into effect the jurisdiction should be lodged with the Committee on Agriculture in the House, and then only after the order consolidating the various credit organizations should become effective.

That is the situation. It is not a question of selfish pride or desire for authorship. The Banking and Currency Committee of this House reported the Farm Loan Act, under which every Federal land bank and joint-stock land bank was established; it reported the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. I ask the Members of the House to get the Senate bill and look at it. You will find that every line and caption and title of the bill refers to the legislation that was reported by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

Some of us have lived with this question of farm credits for many years; we have made this fight in the Committee on Banking and Currency for years; and now that obstacles are about to be removed, now that our labors are about to be crowned with success, I think I might say with some pardonable pride that the Banking and Currency Committee of the House who have all these years fought the battle for the farmers of the country covet the opportunity to complete that work. That is what we ask of this House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 12 minutes of his time. He has 18 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Maryland is recognized for 9 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Before that is done, Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, any member of the Committee on Banking and Currency might gladly welcome relief from facing some of the tremendous responsibilities brought to it by the financial situation. As a matter of personal convenience, as a matter of ease of mind, we of the committee might well hope that the proposal pending might prevail and rejoice in its approval, but, sir, our first duty is to the House and through it to the Nation. This committee has now for nearly 20 years lived with these questions relating to credit for agriculture. The farm loan bill came from this committee. It has in my judgment taken more of the time and more of the energy of this committee than any other one question in all these years, and by reason of that fact it is to be presumed that at least the older Members of the committee would come to the facing of new problems connected with this same subject with some experience, with some acquaintance with the facts, with some knowledge that may be of service to the House. Therefore, if for no other reason, the House should pause before it turns this whole question over to a group of men who, no matter how able, no matter how much concerned they are with agriculture, yet do not know the history of this subject, do not know the law of this subject, do not know the problems involved.

Furthermore, I venture to say that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] would not rise—nor would any other Member rise—and urge that, for example, matters of the tariff relating to agriculture be taken away from the Committee on Ways and Means. I well remember a dozen years ago sharing in a discussion of the agricultural tariff bill, meant entirely for the benefit of agriculture, which came from the Committee on Ways and Means. If any one class of the community is to be taken into consideration, then properly every tariff measure affecting agriculture should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. But this is not primarily a class question, not primarily a question of any one region. It is a question of the welfare of the whole country.

Furthermore, it is a question where not alone the debtor is involved but also where the creditor is involved. Why, in this bill there is a proposal to abolish the joint-stock land banks. That more vitally concerns the people of my own district than any other one particular in this whole field. Would you say that its determination should be entrusted to those who represent only one side of this question, only the agricultural interest? No; you would say, of course, that this ought to go to gentlemen who are concerned with both sides of the question; who are primarily concerned, first, last, and all the time, with the welfare of the country as a whole. Therefore, all logic and all precedent prove that at this juncture it would not be wise to dispense with the experience—with the knowledge—that through all these years has been acquired by the committee charged with matters of finance, and because from one point of view the questions involved seem at first sight to affect particularly the interest of one class in the community, turn it over to a committee whose jurisdiction concerns that class only. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I note that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] says that his committee, the Committee on Banking and Currency, has been for 12 years experimenting with this problem—the problem of financing agriculture. Yes; experimenting with it, and at the same time wrecking agriculture in this Nation. We, who represent agriculture, are through with experimenting. We demand action. We want real, not make-believe farm legislation. No committee in this House can deal with farm legislation as intelligently, efficiently, and well as the Committee on Agriculture. [Applause.]

There is a feeling abroad among the farmers of this Nation—a suspicion against anything that has the name "banking", or "banking and currency" connected with it. The Banking Committee, like Caesar's wife, is under suspicion by the farmers of this Nation, and rightly so. We know that in the Banking Committees of both the House and the Senate they strangle agricultural babies that they do not want before they are born.

The Frazier bill has been before the Banking and Currency Committee of this House for over 2 years, and that committee is still experimenting with it—strangling it, and therefore we have had no results.

If agriculture is to survive, the farmers of this Nation must be refinanced at a much lower rate of interest on long-time payments and on the amortization plan. You cannot get such lower rates of interest out of the Banking and Currency Committee, no matter how amiable and well meaning the gentlemen on that committee may be. According to their own spokesman, they have been experimenting with that problem for 12 years. They have all they can do in taking care of the banks and bankers of this Nation. Their time is taken up with refinancing banks and banking institutions. And the refinancing of banks just does not mix with the refinancing of agricultural indebtedness. Banks thrive and live on high rates of interest and agriculture prospers on low rates of interest. The needs of agriculture and banking are opposite each other, and should be, and must be handled by different committees.

Therefore, we say to the Members of this House that the Committee on Agriculture is the proper committee to deal with the problem of refinancing agriculture. We want the President's message on refinancing agricultural indebtedness referred to that committee. We want it in the hands of the friends of agriculture—in the hands of those who understand agriculture from the farmers' viewpoint and not from the bankers' viewpoint. The Members on the Committee on Agriculture were selected because of their knowledge, their experience, and their familiarity with agricultural problems, while the Members on the Committee on Banking and Currency were selected because of their knowledge and familiarity with banking problems.

The very fact that the Committee on Banking and Currency in this House has had the Frazier bill before it for over 2 years and has not seen fit to hold a single hearing upon it, while in the Senate they have held numerous hearings during the past year on the bill, is sufficient reason why this message should go to the Committee on Agriculture. We have confidence in the administration, and we are sure the administration wants the bill on the refinancing of farm indebtedness prepared by the friends of agriculture, who are best qualified, and who have first-hand knowledge on the subject. It wants a bill that will meet the demands and the requirements of the farmers, and no committee in this House is better qualified than the one which Mr. JONES presides over. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the agricultural interests of this Nation, and as a farmer myself, I earnestly beg of you to let this bill go to the Committee on Agriculture. There is nothing as dangerous in America today as the farmers in revolution in the middle States and the great West. They have lost their faith in the Committee on Banking and Currency. There is no question about that. The chairman of that committee exclaimed, "Why are the farmers interested in credit?" Good heavens! is there anything we are more deeply interested in than money and credit? That is just what we are most interested in. If the present hodge-podge system of lending to farm interests of this Nation is representative of the work of the Committee on Banking and Currency, please give the Committee on Agriculture a chance at it and see if we cannot do something better.

I personally have paid all the way from 5 to 9½ percent to Government lending agencies. I am extremely anxious to see this matter referred to the Committee on Agriculture. Long ago Charles Beard in his history, The Rise of American Civilization, said:

> In every age and in every clime where civilization has passed its most primitive form there has always appeared a group of men devoted to finance, commerce, and industry, and the group have always borne with terrific oppression upon the group that derived their sustenance from agriculture.

Agriculture believes that the banking East is bearing down terrifically, and they want some relief. It must come in the shape of more liberal loans, lower interest rates, and longer amortization periods for their loans. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in his message yesterday the President of the United States said that this was "to restore to farmers the hope of ultimate free ownership of their land", and then he said:

I seek an end to the threatened loss of homes and productive capacity now faced by hundreds of thousands of American farm families.

This is a farm-relief measure. It ought to go to the farmers' committee. It ought not to go to a bankers' committee. The bankers have been running the business of the farmers long enough. Running that business has ruined most of our farmers.

I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] that if he expects farmers now to get any relief as to farm mortgages from the Committee on Banking and Currency, why is it that just such a measure as this has been pending before his committee for 3 years without relief? It is my firm belief that our farmers cannot expect much relief from that committee. [Applause.]

Three years ago I introduced a bill to stop Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks from foreclosing mortgages against farms until this country recovers from this depression, and to provide for the redemption of farms sold under foreclosures. It was a good bill. It would have stopped foreclosures against farms. It would have provided adequate means to redeem farms already foreclosed. It would have done what the President now says he wants to do, "restore to farmers the hope of ultimate free ownership of their land." By that bill I sought an end, just as the President now says that he "seeks an end to the threatened loss of homes and productive capacity now faced by hundreds of thousands of American farm families." That bill of mine, had it been passed into law, would have saved thousands of farmers within the last year from being turned out of their homes.

But that bill of mine, Mr. Speaker, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. There were other bills sent to this committee of like import. The committee granted hearings on the proposed legislation. At first the committee was sympathetic and there seemed to be a unanimous inclination to favorably report the bill. Then certain banking interests opposed it. Then the Treasury Department sent its representatives before the committee to defeat the measure. And the bills all died pigeonholed in the committee. And farmers have been suffering ever since.

One situation above all others that has caused ruin and desolation in farm homes is that when farmers have needed money to finance their crops, many of them have been forced to pay 10, and 12, and even in instances 15 percent interest to banks, and have been forced to mortgage their work stock, their milch cows, their brood sows, and all their farm tools and utensils, and when crops failed, some banks have foreclosed, and taken from them all they had.

I am glad, indeed, that their forlorn cry of distress has at last been heard by a President in the White House. This is no time to experiment. This is no time to take chances. This is no time to further depend upon the Committee on Banking and Currency, which time and again has brought on this floor legislation asserted to be sufficient to grant necessary relief to farmers, yet did not require such relief to be granted, and under it no relief was granted. Time and again we tried to get this committee to adopt language that would force relief. But it would not. Time and again we tried to get this committee to force the passage of a bill that would guarantee 100 percent the deposits of farmers and other citizens in all banks. But the Committee has hesitated. It has let banks and bankers talk them out of it. It has let banking interests keep back all proper measures that would adequately guarantee bank deposits. If this Banking and Currency Committee will get busy and favorably report and pass a proper measure to guarantee absolutely all bank deposits 100 percent, and we can get the Senate to pass it, and the President to sign it, this committee will have performed a most valuable service to the country; it should devote all of its time to that much-desired accomplishment, because until bank deposits are adequately guaranteed, we will never get the banking business back to normalcy and upon a sound financial footing again.

And it is time for the bankers to realize that they will never repeal the postal savings law and get the Government out of the banking business until they get a law passed guaranteeing bank deposits. Whenever all bank deposits are absolutely guaranteed 100 percent, then I will work uncompromisingly to repeal the postal savings law and take the Government out of the banking business.

Personally I am the friend of every member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have in them all absolute confidence. I know that they are sincere and are all friends of farmers. But they have been under a banking-and-currency environment so long, and they have heard so little from farmers and have heard so much from bankers, that I am rather afraid that the atmosphere of their committee chambers smacks more of banking than it does of farming. Bankers have a way of getting their side and their propaganda before a committee. Farmers are not so well organized.

For the reasons I have stated I feel compelled to vote for the motion of my colleague from Texas [Mr. JONES] to refer the President's message to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, one of the largest lines of business engaged in by me during all the years has been agriculture. In the next place merchandising and banking, selling a general line of merchandise, mostly on credit, and loaning money to farmers. I say to you now, that there is just as much difference between financing and advancing credit to farmers and financing and advancing credit through commercial banks for commercial purposes as there is between day and night. The gentleman, Mr. STEAGALL, of Alabama, a while ago referred to the various bills that had been handled by his committee for the past years creating credit facilities for the purpose of extending credit to farmers. I am willing to state here and now that his committee has either been under the control of that great and powerful commercial banking interest or his members have not been able to grasp the difference between agricultural credit and commercial credit. The present deplorable condition of agriculture has been brought about because of the type of agricultural credit legislation passed by his committee. The Agricultural Committee has agricultural problems before it in season and out of season. We understand the problems of agriculture. We are in a better position to know how to finance the farmers and with reference to extension of credit than is the Committee on Banking and Currency. In this bill we propose to take care of thousands of drainage projects, located in 34 different States. There are 5,000,000 farmers residing in these districts today that are facing bankruptcy, and unless they are properly financed, and with low rates of interest, they will be forced into the hands of receivers.

My friends, I say to you this is one of the most important bills that has been considered since I have been a Member of Congress. It is purely a relief proposition. If you will submit this bill to the Committee on Agriculture, where we have time, where we can give it thought and put into execution what we have already studied about agricultural credits, we will be able to bring out a bill that will give relief to agriculture.

Farmers are getting sick and tired of the Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Land Bank Board dictating to the Banking and Currency Committee. They are willing to trust us. We must give long terms and low rates of interest—the very things we have not had. In all my banking experience in dealing with agriculture and trying to deal through the various credit organizations as created by the Banking and Currency Committee I have never been able to properly assist in financing agriculture. I hope you will do the wise and proper thing; that is, place in the hands of the Agricultural Committee, which is interested in, and which has given great thought to agriculture, this bill, whereby we can give prompt action to it.

The gentleman said a few moments ago that the bill introduced in the Senate was referred to the Committee on Finance. This is true. However, the Finance Committee immediately sent it to the Committee on Agriculture, and that committee is now considering the bill. It is understood that this committee will put it on the relief bill now pending before that committee and send it over to the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time merely to make a suggestion. First, the implication in several of the speeches that the Committee on Banking and Currency has been to blame for our present condition in banking is, of course, preposterous on its face. I doubt whether there is a more progressive or useful committee in the House than the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I doubt whether there is a committee in the House that does its work better than the Committee on Banking and Currency. I say the same thing about the Committee on Agriculture.

I may say, however, that it looks to me as though we are approaching an entirely new phase of legislation in government, and that is the loaning by the Government for the protection of the homes of this country. I do not believe at the present time there is great choice between these two committees on this subject. It seems to me, indeed, we ought to have "a committee on farm and home credits", because we are going to come to that on a constantly increasing scale.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is only one fundamental and primary question involved here for the decision of the Members of the House, and that is whether or not under the history of prior legislation affecting the matters involved in the bill in controversy, whether under the proposition of the fundamental jurisdiction conferred upon these respective committees by the rules of the House, this bill ought to take the ordinary course of being referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency or take the extraordinary course of being referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

As far as I am concerned, and as far as most of the Members of the House are concerned, there is nothing of the personal equation entering into the consideration of this question. I do not know that there is a committee of this House, if I may say a personal word, upon which I have more intimate and more beloved personal friends and associates than the Committee on Agriculture. As far as I could I have gone along and cooperated with it in every progressive measure for the relief of this great industry representing the agricultural sections; but, gentlemen, we have certain established principles of government and procedure here in this House that have been built up through a series of years. Their wisdom, their probity, and their prudence have not been speculative and imaginary things, but they have been the result of a regular system of experience and experiment.

In speaking of this bill I am merely undertaking to argue the fundamental question of where this bill ought to go, not what might happen to it after it goes there. I am assuming, and I have the right to assume, that the membership of the Committee on Banking and Currency and the membership of the Committee on Agriculture are both anxious and eager to carry out the fundamental requests of the President's message on this bill—the one as much as the other. Take a bill of this sort affecting matters of parliamentary procedure, matters of jurisdiction of committees, and analyze it for just a moment.

Under all the precedents of the House, under all the formal practices of the House, under all the formal references of bills introduced under the subject matter covered in this bill, and you will find without exception that every one of them has been referred, and properly referred, to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Under the rules of the House this committee has jurisdiction over matters of banking and currency. The Committee on Agriculture has jurisdiction over matters relating to agriculture and forestry. This bill and the several sections of it refer to measures that have always heretofore been considered and reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The suggestion has been made that under some new set-up that may be created under the President's executive order 60 days from now a bill of this sort might properly be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. Gentlemen, we are now acting merely upon the status quo.

What is the parliamentary situation? What have been all of the precedents? I do not think it can be assumed, from the record of members of either of these committees, that one would more favorably consider the President's recommendations than the other.

My only interest in this matter, and it is purely an impersonal one, because I have endeavored over a number of years to give some little thought and attention to the matter of preserving the stability of the rules of the House, the coherence and continuity of our proceedings here. It seems to me that the arguments in this case, not the ad hominem argument, but the parliamentary argument, is in favor of referring this bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Now, there is a peculiar parliamentary situation presented here to which I wish to call attention. If you agree with my views on this question and want this bill referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency instead of the Committee on Agriculture, you will first have to vote down the previous question of the gentleman from Texas, and that will bring up the direct issue of how you stand on this proposition.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker (Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair), the gentleman who has just preceded me is a man whom I admire possibly as much as any man in this group, or anywhere else. The question before us, if you please, is essentially not one involving meticulous attention to parliamentary procedure but one which is directed entirely to the relief of a basic industry of this country.

The history of the credit extended to agriculture under the banking legislation we now have and the banking institutions we now have places agricultural credit in ill repute. Agriculture has had too much credit of the wrong kind. There should be a great difference, Mr. Speaker, between commercial credit and agricultural credit. There is no question on the face of this earth but that the average commercial loan is a bad loan for both the farmer and the banker who makes it. In the first place the loans are too short to enable the man engaged in agriculture to even remotely believe it possible that he will be able to meet his indebtedness when it falls due, and the interest rate is too high.

The consideration of a measure of this character, in my opinion, goes directly to the question of whether or not the intention of this body is to do something of direct and signal benefit to agriculture. The question is not whether we are going to continue the system of agricultural credits we now have, which was erected according to the idea of commercial bankers.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENNAN].

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, I come from an agricultural district. I come from that part of the country west of the Allegheny Mountains. It is not my purpose nor is this the time, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the condition of the American farmer.

I do not believe there is any Member of this House who is afraid to trust this bill with either of the committees that is seeking jurisdiction, but I want to say, Mr. Speaker, there is something more involved in this matter. The people of the West are looking to the Capitol. The farmers of the Nation are looking to the Capitol today. If this bill is not sent to the Committee on Agriculture, where it belongs, the confidence that the farmers of this Nation have in their Congress will be materially impaired. [Applause.] I am asking you, not for the purpose of complimenting any committee in this House, not for the purpose of complimenting any individual in this House, but for the purpose of restoring confidence to that great army which is suffering in the West through loss of their earnings in the agricultural field, to refer this bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

I could go on to remind you that today the farmer is suffering agonies untold, his back is bent down, judgment after judgment is upon him, foreclosure after foreclosure, and eviction after eviction are his lot. So may I ask you instead of trying to determine to whom this bill shall be referred, may you not look back to my people and say by your vote here that this Congress is looking with its eyes westward once more and that the farmer will get some relief. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, after listening to the debate, that we are approaching this subject from a wrong angle.

This is not a question of whether you are willing to vote farm relief; it is simply a question of which committee, under the precedents and rules of the House, from its previous experience, from its previous handling of legislation in this House, is better qualified at this time to take up this legislation.

We are all in favor of giving the farmers relief, but that is not the question pending now. The question of whether former banking bills have furnished proper relief is not before us. We propose now to amend these laws and pass new ones. This is merely a question of procedure now before us.

This question, without shadow of doubt, is seven eighths a banking and financial proposition. As I understand from a casual reading of the bill, you propose to reorganize the Federal land banks, liquidate the joint-stock land banks, and in general reorganize the banking legislation along all credit lines, especially as referred to farm loans.

The Banking and Currency Committee is set up for this purpose and has always handled these bills. This is one of their real functions and, it seems to me in all fairness and in the interest of absolute honesty of consideration and doing what is best for the people of the whole country, this bill rightfully belongs to the Committee on Banking and Currency. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to measure words and opinions with the distinguished gentleman who has preceded me. It would be most presumptuous, indeed. I want to say to you, only, that I think I can well speak for the 1¼ million farmers in the great State of Ohio whom I represent.

I want to submit that this is a question of preserving the perpetuity and the integrity not of a committee of this House, not of the House itself, but that great institution, the American farm home.

I say not one word against the Banking and Currency Committee or against the bankers themselves. I only speak for these sons of toil, these tillers in the great Corn Belt, who produce the golden grain, and your splendid planters in the Southland who raise the cotton that we wear.

I look into these homes and see these folks being strangled in the deadly clutches of the moneylender. We want this bill to be considered by its real friends, not alone that confidence may go out to these farmers, but that new hope that will forestall a revolution may come to them.

If this were a banking bill is anyone so foolish as to believe that the farmers would be consulted? If it were a bill relating to the powers of the Federal Reserve Board to inflate or deflate the incomes of the masses of this country—would the farmers be asked to sit in on the conference? If it were a bill to benefit the railroads with their immense overcapitalization, their watered stocks, high-salaried executives who stubbornly refuse to advocate the reduction of freight and passenger rates—would the farmers be asked to air their views? No. They look upon the farm as a mere granary from which the city is to be supplied with food and raw materials for clothing.

The workmen who hew in wood and stone and steel long have recognized what bankers fail to perceive—namely, a good foundation is necessary before a wrecked structure can be restored. The carpenter knows a rotted sill precedes a collapsed building; the ironworker who rivets the steel beams of lofty skyscrapers realizes that the structure stands longest when firmly anchored to the living rock; yet the superindustrialists and big bankers, who have dictated policies of government for 12 long years, are too blind, selfish, or stupid to see that a profitless agriculture has ever been the treacherous quicksand that pulls the whole Nation down into the bottomless depths of utter ruin and disaster. We want farm relief to come from friends and not from known enemies or lukewarm supporters.

The farmer has been selling food and raw materials for clothing at less than cost of production. This continued impoverishment has reduced his purchasing power to the vanishing point, annihilated his land values, and increased his mortgage indebtedness to the breaking point. He has survived as long as his accumulated resources lasted, and, now being unable to borrow more money, he is definitely out of the buying market, cannot pay his taxes; his lands are confiscated daily by the foreclosures of the moneylenders; the whole Nation wallows in the slough of depression which becomes ever deeper, ever more bitter; and, if continued much longer, will terminate in universal doles, repudiation of debts, and chaos.

Never before in the history of this country has there been witnessed a calamity such as now engulfs us. Never before in the history of American Government have the human rights of the many been so brazenly trampled under foot, and with such malignant hatred as by and for the property rights of the privileged few. "Surplus of wheat, surplus of cotton", they cry, while people are starving in their nakedness. "Overproduction", they shout, unmindful that the greatest overproduction is a surplus of wretched peasants, ill-fed serfs, and able-bodied paupers. So I speak to you in defense of an issue as righteous as the cause of liberty—the saving of American farms and homes. The Democratic administration must meet the issue foursquare, and stand ready and wholly unafraid to face the severest test of its existence, the test of its ability to overthrow the control and domination of the plutocrats, money kings, and international bankers, and restore the country to its own people with equal rights to all and special privilege to none.

It must not only provide for a complete refinancing of farm mortgages at very low rates of interest, but must call a halt on the moneylenders' predatory operations. We must demand a complete suspension of mortgage foreclosures until the President's refinancing bill becomes operative.

Tabulation of reports received from practically all of the States indicate that an average of 5,000 farms, homes, and properties are confiscated every day by the moneylenders of this country. Following the passage of the President's farm relief and farm refinancing bills an interim of at least 60 days will elapse before the bills become operative. This would permit 300,000 more American farms and homes to be legally stolen under the present antiquated, outworn, and unjust mortgage-foreclosure and deficiency-judgment laws.

I want to tear away forever the destroying tentacles of the bloodsuckers who have bled the farmer white.

These trying times call for vision into the future; they call for a new deal in legal thinking and in judiciary procedure. This bill represents fundamentally, analytically, and in every other way American agriculture. The first duty of this Congress is to the food producers of this Nation and to the heroic efforts of President Roosevelt to save these tillers of the soil from engaging their fellows in mortal and bloody combat.

The farmers may not be so well informed on precedent and custom and tradition. They do know justice when they see it, and this case is merely one of justice—simple and long-delayed justice to those perhaps who are most entitled to it—the tillers of the soil. Mention has been made that if this bill is referred to the Committee on Agriculture it will be a one-sided proposition. That is exactly the trouble with farmers today. For 12 years they have been on one side of a plea for relief and the bankers have been on the other side, with the bankers always winning. The new day has arrived and we propose to fulfill our promise to the farmer and place him for the first time in American history on the winning side.

What did the Democratic Party offer the farmer? Why, it offered him the right to live again, to hope once more, and for the pursuit of happiness and contentment. Obviously this can be accomplished only by insuring him the cost of production, lower operating expenses, reduced taxes, and adequate credit facilities. Agriculture is bled white to furnish transfusions of the big bankers, railroads, and mortgage-loan companies. The bankers refuse to loan the farmers money, the moneylenders sell him out, and the loan sharks crush him with 36 percent interest. The farmer has applied for new loans and his applications have been rejected; he has pleaded for extensions and his pleas have been scorned; he has petitioned for a moratorium and his petitions have been ignored. So he petitions no longer, he pleads no more, he applies no more; he defies them and demands relief from the strangling cord of the moneylender.

The Democratic Party answered with a pledge to refinance farm mortgages through recognized farm-bank agencies at low rates of interest, with preference given to loans for the redemption of farms and homes lost through foreclosures. Let us redeem that pledge now in letter and in spirit.

When we passed the President's farm relief bill in this House we fulfilled the first step in our promise to give American agriculture a new deal. Now let us complete the second step by voting to refer this bill to the home of its friends—the Committee on Agriculture.

Let us fulfill the glowing promises that have often been made by others in the past, but invariably broken and cast aside after each Presidential election.

A real friend of the common people is now in the White House. When Governor Roosevelt was inaugurated President of the United States the masses rather than the classes became the chief concern of government. Special-privilege interests used every conceivable, despicable method to defeat him solely because of his championship of the "forgotten men", who personifies the distressed millions of the farms, and the other distressed millions in the cities. This opposition was to be expected since the election of Roosevelt meant the end of the vicious system under which 80 percent of our Nation's wealth had become centered in the hands of 4 percent of our people. The President is deeply convinced that prosperity cannot return to the Nation until the farmer's buying and debt-paying power is restored, and it was because he had the courage to say this that the wolf pack of Wall Street marked him for slaughter. They failed miserably. Let this Congress not fail in its duty to the President of the United States and to the suffering masses on the farms. Let us free them from the shackles of the bankers.

No man has ever aspired to the Presidency who understands the farm problem better than President Roosevelt, and this is true because he owns and operates large farms himself. Since he was elected a new hope dwells in every heart and a new light shines in every farm home, and likewise in the homes of the millions of idle and hungry ones in our great industrial centers, the small business man, and the distressed homeowners in the cities. The existing situation under which we have granaries bursting with foodstuffs with little or no sale value on the one hand, and millions of hungry men, women, and children on the other, is as damnable as it is unnecessary, and the election of Roosevelt was a direct challenge to this perilous situation. Let us all, Republicans as well as Democrats, hold up his hands in this courageous attempt to end forever the vicious control of the bankers over 50,000,000 producers of the two elementals of life itself, food and clothing.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

Mr. MCFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in favor of the motion to refer this measure to the Committee on Agriculture. I have no word of criticism of the Banking and Currency Committee; but, as the previous speakers have said time and again today on this floor, the Banking and Currency Committee of the House has had every opportunity to work out such a program as is provided in this bill, and it has failed to bring in such a measure.

I believe the American farmers and those dependent upon them are expecting this legislation to be referred to the Committee on Agriculture in order that it may be given an opportunity to speedily bring in some such agricultural-relief measure.

> Princes and lords may flourish and may fade;
> A breath can make them as a breath hath made;
> But the bold yeomanry of the countryside
> When once destroyed can never be supplied.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not represent any farmers. I have not any farmers in my district except window farmers who grow plants and flowers on their window sills, but we have 300,000 of unemployed in my city. I am interested in having this bill referred to friendly hands, the Committee on Agriculture, that understands the problems of the farmer, so we can set again in motion the wheels of industry, and you will find the men from the city of Detroit will back the measure and now are asking to have it referred to the Committee on Agriculture. It is said this is an extraordinary matter to refer to this committee. My answer to that is that these are extraordinary times. We have not been proceeding in the last month over an ordinary course; this is not the time for only ordinary measures. I hope that this Congress sees fit to apply some extraordinary measures to the moneylenders of Wall Street internationalism.

This measure should go to the Agriculture Committee, for what we want is action and action now. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, strange to say, all of the discussion so far has gone far of the real mark. Every man who has objected to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture has assumed that this particular measure is the only thing involved. Read the President's message—

> I ask the Congress for specific legislation relating to the mortgages and other forms of indebtedness of the farmers of the Nation.

Every conceivable form of credit will follow the transfer of this Presidential message to one or the other committees. I freely concede to my friends on the Banking and Currency Committee that they have worked hard, that they have had an infinite task. There is a great deal of work connected with essential legislation that must go to that committee. It will have much to do. It deals with the issue of currency, which is the lifeblood of the Nation. It has jurisdiction of many matters. But what is the issue here? Read the Executive order under which the Farm Credit Administration is established. It is established around the old Farm Board as a nucleus, and you will see that every form of agricultural credit that is involved—crop loans in the Department of Agriculture, cooperative credit, and emergency credit of all kinds—are involved in this transaction.

My friend from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] refers to the 12 long years that his committee has worked on this proposition. I concede that they have worked. During those 12 years the Committee on Agriculture has also worked. We will leave him the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee as such—commercial banking, the Federal Reserve Act, and those things that are incident thereto. But I say to you that the 10-, 12-, and 8-percent interest that the farmers have paid on their short-term loans from the commercial banks have been a chain and a hobble about the feet of agriculture for more than 12 years. [Applause.]

I want agriculture to have a distinct place in this new deal. I have studied agricultural questions for more than 12 years. I have given the prime and bloom of my life to this subject. I want to see the question of agriculture torn from the bankers of the Nation and to have agriculture stand on its own bottom. I am pleading for an industry that is prostrate. I am pleading for a cause in which this Nation's very life is involved. I ask you to let this question go to a committee that has time to consider it, study it, and learn about it, a committee that will take care of agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES) there were—ayes 172, noes 83.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to refer the message to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The message referred to by order of the House is referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered printed.

EXECUTIVE ORDERS RELATING TO VETERANS' RELIEF, ETC. (S.DOC. NO. 10)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Pursuant to the provision of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith a photostat copy of Executive orders embodying the regulations approved March 31, 1933, relating to veterans' relief, which have been issued in accordance with the terms of title I of that law.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 4, 1933.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KVALE. That is to inquire whether there will be a sufficient number of copies of the message just read printed to meet the requirements facing us in each mail.

The SPEAKER. There will be a sufficient number, and if not, we will order additional copies.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUCE. Inasmuch as this Executive order changes the laws of the United States, has any consideration been given to whether or not it ought to be incorporated in the annual volume of the code, showing changes in the law?

The SPEAKER. That has not been considered, but the Chair thinks it would require legislation to incorporate it in the statute. The Chair thinks that ought to be considered by a committee of the House in some way.

Mr. LUCE. If when the laws of the United States are changed by the Chief Executive, may I inquire further whether the Committee on Printing would have any jurisdiction of such legislation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman to defer the question until later so that an investigation can be made in respect to the matter.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Does the gentleman feel that he can conclude in 5 minutes?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We want to take up the District appropriation bill, and with the understanding that the gentleman will conclude in 5 minutes I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have asked for this time to call attention to the state of mind of the House. Unquestionably, from the standpoint of a great many Members of the House who voted to refer the message of the President to the Committee on Agriculture, under the rules and precedents that message should have gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency. But this House, and perhaps justly so, is in a state of rebellion against legislation that has been proposed here from the Banking and Currency Committee that has not come from the people who are supposed to be benefited. In suggestng that, I tell you that I am a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. I have risen on this floor time and time again, and I have complained of the way we were not doing business in our committee. I have complained at the way we hesitate until we receive orders from some other source. I do not always know from what source it comes. I have seen the management of the Treasury and of the Federal Reserve Board for the past 3 or 4 years, and their management of the finances of this country has been undoubtedly destructive to the best interests of the people of this Nation. [Applause.] I say to you that I regard the present Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Eugene Meyer, as the most detrimental influence to the recovery of this country that it is possible for you to find in all the bounds of this fair land. [Applause.] The gentleman I was sitting by in the House a moment ago told me that one of the banks in his home town this week was directed by the Federal Reserve Board to reduce its loans from $11,000,000 to $8,000,000. How they are going to do it they do not know. They must squeeze $3,000,000 out of that community and retire that amount of credit from circulation. What was supposed to be an inflationary move for the benefit of this country, put forth only a few days ago, when it was proposed to supply $2,000,000,000 in money, has resulted in a contraction of the currency to the amount of more than a quarter of a billion dollars.

I tell you this: I am not an adviser to the President. He has not asked for any advice from me. The same influences that wrecked the administration that preceded ours, have horned themselves into the Democratic administration as advisers to that administration. Just as surely as you live, unless our President shakes himself loose from those influences and gets some other and different kind of advisers, we will go down just as the administration before us went down in disrepute. [Applause.] One man said, and you all know it is true, if our President will listen to the people who elected him, he will come out all right; but if he listens to the people who destroyed the administration which preceded him, he will come out all wrong. I believe that is true. [Applause.] I say to you if the Banking and Currency Committee of the House stands in disrepute before this House today, it is because it has listened to those same advisers that surrounded the former administration, and who have set themselves up as advisers to our present administration in large part, and as far as they could do so have taken over the prerogatives of dictating what kind of financial legislation shall be enacted for the people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] has expired.

THE EMERGENCY RELIEF BILL—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, may I prefer a unanimous-consent request? I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on the motion which has just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with the President of the United States when he maintains something must be done in behalf of the farmers. It is true the small farm owner has been compelled to give up his home because he was unable to pay taxes and meet other necessary obligations. It is my opinion that it is the duty of the Government to bring about a condition whereby the farmers can preserve their homes, because they are the class of people on whom society must depend for its food—the thing which we mortals must eat if we desire to live. Why hesitate in doing something in a humanitarian way in behalf of our farmers?

I also wish to state that our coal miners, ditch diggers, women who scrub and wash for a living, and every other class of people who possess homes should be given consideration. Hundreds of thousands of men and women throughout the country have lost their homes because they were unable to pay their taxes. A government refusing to assist its citizens in preserving their homes is, in my opinion, not a government for the people. If more consideration would be manifested in behalf of the masses instead of the privileged few, we could truthfully say it is a "government of the people, for the people, and by the people."

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. It is intended to provide credit facilities and loans to the hundreds of thousands of farmers over all this land, whose farms and homes are being sold by mortgage foreclosure at sheriff's sales and for nonpayment of taxes. It is essentially a farm-relief measure, and therefore should not go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, for it embodies very few of the elements of commercial banking, and we should avoid any possibility of its being emasculated at the behest of the Federal Reserve Bank Board.

The farmers and the American people generally are skeptical of the Federal Reserve Banking System.

When we passed the emergency bank relief bill on the opening day of this special session, which provided for the issuance of practically an unlimited quantity of new currency, I said:

> I hope that the additional currency which may be issued by the national banks under this act will render available the credit and funds so sorely needed by the business and industrial interests of our country, in order that there may be a resumption of operations and employment for the people. If the new currency is not placed in circulation, this legislation, my colleagues, will fail of its purpose, which should be to aid the people rather than the banks.

What has happened? We are receiving reports that the Federal Reserve Bank Board is calling upon the member banks to further reduce their loans and contract, instead of expand, the banking credit in the local communities of this country. Members of the House, if this unwise and vicious policy is not checked, it will prove the ruination of our people.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate Agricultural Committee, in its report recommending immediate passage of this farm and mortgage relief bill, declares:

> No substantial relief is possible for agriculture until the policy of deflation is not only checked but reversed and a substantial sum of money is admitted and, if need be, forced into circulation.
> We report that it is not sufficient to have an ample supply of currency in the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks, and that it is not even sufficient to have an ample supply of currency in the vaults of the national, State, and private banks of the country.

The Senate committee unanimously recommends inflation of the currency without recommending any particular plan, the members being divided between remonetization of silver, reduction of the gold content of the dollar, and several other proposals. The members of the committee condemn the Federal Reserve System and assert that it has failed in the recent monetary crisis and permitted $25,000,000,000 of bank credit to be canceled and destroyed since the start of the banking crisis.

I shall therefore vote "aye" on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to refer this legislation to the Committee on Agriculture. I trust that a similar measure for the relief of the small home owners, to refinance their mortgages and real-estate contracts at a lower rate of interest, will also soon be introduced and passed in this body.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the President's message on farm mortgages and farm indebtedness deals with the whole structure of agriculture indebtedness and agriculture credits, and the motion to send it to the Agriculture Committee must prevail. This is, for many reasons, the most important of all agriculture questions this Congress has had. Issues upon which the very life of this Nation depend are involved in this message. It covers not only farm mortgages but it includes every class of agriculture indebtedness and every conceivable system of agriculture credit that may hereafter arise; it involves legislation, the success or failure of which means either the rehabilitation or the entire wiping out of the agriculture industry.

To this Nation the legislation sought by this message is the most vital matter now before Congress. Adequate, workable, and proper agriculture credit legislation must be forthwith enacted; that this is true we all agree, but as to what committee of this House shall work out that legislation is the question to be resolved at this instant. Shall it be the Banking and Currency Committee or shall it be the Committee on Agriculture? To me there is but one answer.

The President has asked and this Congress has given him broad executive powers on the subject of economy. In pursuance of that power he, on March 27, swung the broadaxe of bureaucratic abolition and set the starting post of consolidation of overlapping boards.

The Federal Farm Board is abolished. The Federal Farm Loan Bureau, the Federal Loan Board, the Farm Loan Commissioner, the Crop Production Loan Office, and the Seed Loan Office, together with the functions of the Treasury Department and the Department of Agriculture, insofar as these Departments "gave aid to farmers", and the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation relating to the management of the Agriculture Credit Corporation, have all been consolidated so far as their usefulness is concerned, and abolished so far as their overlapping, duplicating, conflicting, and useless agencies are concerned. This consolidation is to be set up under one head—the Farm Credit Administration—for which the President has asked adequate and workable legislation to put it into operation.

At the stroke of the President's pen there was a saving of $2,000,000. This was the unexpended balance in the Farm Board, which will be returned to the Treasury. This saving is in addition to the other savings to be effected by his order of abolition and consolidation. By this order there will be a lot of high-salaried men added to the army of unemployed. I hold no brief for them. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

That the agriculture credit agencies of this Nation should be consolidated is indisputable. It eliminates the overlapping, the duplicating, and the conflicting boards, bureaus, offices, and commissions. Now, the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration can appoint all necessary subordinate administrative boards and officers designed to do each separate class of work without such duplication and overlapping.

SUBJECTS FOR THE COMMITTEE

A review of some of the things to be considered by the committee to which this message is referred will probably be of interest. In my State, where the chain-bank system prevails, the banks, among other things, have succeeded in peddling their bad loans—their mistakes—to the Government through the Regional Agriculture Credit Corporation. leaving the Government to hold the sack; yes, they have traded their worthless paper and hopeless security for Uncle Sam's good money which was designed to help the farmer and the rancher. A considerable percentage of the loans made have only prolonged the misery of the farmer and rancher for a short time, and has put the money sent out there by the Government into the channel and the funnel of the chain-bank system, so that it will soon find its way back to Wall Street without material aid except to that banking system.

The farmer is carrying three unbearable loads: First, excessive interest rates, which go to the money barons; second, an unbearable tax burden caused by extravagant governments, ranging from the National Government all the way down the line to the school district; and, third, exorbitant freight rates. These are the balls and chains welded to the ankle of every farmer and rancher. I have dragged them; I am dragging them now; the shackle that holds them to my ankle has cut to the very bone. I feel for and am pleading for the millions who are suffering like torture.

We have not had relief on interest rates from the bankers. We have not had relief on taxes from the benefactors of extravagant governments; and we have not had relief on the freight rates from the transportation companies. Indeed, the farmer will not get relief at all unless he battles in his own defense. The battle he is putting up now is to defend his right to have this message referred to his committee instead of the Banking Committee.

Let the farmers farm and let the bankers bank. There are plenty of banking subjects to take up the bankers' time while the farmers are taking care of this message. There is WHEELER's silver bill, and there is the proposition of the Government's guaranteeing bank deposits. Both of these are bound to become laws sooner or later, and the sooner the better. And then a little time devoted to the Federal Reserve Board and its favoritism to the chain-bank system would not go amiss.

The Federal Reserve, having for its purpose an inflationary movement for the benefit of the country, only a few days ago put forth with one hand, under the new Bank Conservation Act, vast sums of new and freshly printed money, while with the other hand—the deflationary hand—it is calling its loans and thereby contracting the currency. It is directing its member banks to reduce its loans by a certain percentage; that just forces that amount of money out of the local community and takes that amount of credit out of circulation. In the chain-bank territory it just throws that amount of money out of the local channels of trade and centralizes it in the parent bank. From the valleys and prairies of Montana, from the plains of the Dakotas and Nebraska, from the cornfields of Iowa, and from the dairy farms of Minnesota and Wisconsin, the chain-bank system is drawing the money to New York, where stands the Statue of Liberty pointing to Europe.

The agriculture credit we now have is patterned along the line of commercial banking. It has put agriculture credit in bad repute, and under conditions of the last few years it has not aided banking institutions generally—only those benefited by centralization of wealth. Agriculture has had too much credit of the wrong kind—wrong because of too high interest rates and too early maturity dates. There is a world of difference between commercial credit and agriculture credit. I interpret the President's message as advice to Congress to divorce these two systems of credit and to work out an adequate system of agriculture credit.

FARMERS LOOKING TO WASHINGTON

All the farmers of this Nation are looking to the White House and to the Capitol Building, and their ear is eager for news on the subject "agriculture credit." If the news goes out that this message has gone to the Banking Committee, I warn you that it will breed germs of rebellion in the heart of the farmer and it will retard the confidence that has been manifest since March 4. On the other hand, if this message goes to the Agriculture Committee, where it of right belongs, then the great army of producers will know that our eyes are turned from Wall Street and we are looking westward to the breadbox of this Nation.

HOW THE FARMER'S MONEY BECAME CENTRALIZED

Originally the farmer's money stayed at home and worked over and over and over to build up the community. His fencing and his building materials were made of local products. He produced most of his food, killed and cured his own meat, and local mills ground his flour. The people in the nearby towns and cities bought his products. They did their delivery and draying and joyriding with horses bought from him, and they bought his hay and grain to feed them. The money remained in the community. It was deposited in the local banks where other farmers could borrow it. Nearly everyone was a good moral risk. The banks were locally owned, hence he was borrowing his neighbor's money, and his neighbors had the benefit of the interest he paid. When borrowed, this money was spent in the community, and the persons with whom it was spent respent it in the same local channels of trade. It got back to the same bank to be reloaned again.

The modern set-up has changed all this. The farmer now buys tractors and automobiles manufactured in the East. His building and fencing material is shipped in. The town and city man who formerly bought his horses and his feed now buys motor vehicles which are fed with gasoline, neither of which are produced in the farmer's field. Telephones and electric lights have been installed with materials manufactured in eastern centers, and all profits from the tolls and service of these companies leave the community. Fire insurance written in eastern centers takes millions annually from the farming sections; however, some of this gets back in the form of loans upon which an exorbitant rate of interest is sent to the East, and the loan when paid goes back to the insurance company without help to the local banker. Then come the mail-order houses that take the farmer's business from the local merchant and take not only the profit but the entire purchase money out of the community, and the chain store leaves only its operating expenses in the local town.

Succeeding generations emerging from the habits and characteristics of their frugal forebears fell easy victims to the urge of modern ideas and living, and have placed mortgages upon their lands with which to purchase modern conveniences. Land values increased, thereby increasing taxes, and roads and bridges added more to these already heavy tax burdens. Then came the decline in agriculture prices, while taxes, cost of living, interest rates, and transportation charges increased.

The farmer, with the trend of the times, became more of a wholesaler, specializing in his product—wheat, cattle, sheep, cotton, corn, hogs, and dairy products. For these products he received wholesale prices which were lower than local or retail prices. The middleman and the profiteer crept in between the farmer and his market, absorbing a large percentage, if not all, of his profits, which also left his community. Then, under the chain-bank system, and under the modern slogan of "safety first", these banks carried a large percentage of their balances in eastern banks under the line on their balance sheet of "due from other banks and bankers." Indeed, there are hundreds of ways the money from the farming sections has been carried to the eastern manufacturing and financial centers, and the West has been drained of its cash.

This money has been used to build the world's highest skyscrapers, fine hotels, palatial homes, and beautiful and costly edifices, both public and private. In general, it has built up and supported the great cities of the financial East. It has also been used to finance huge corporate enterprises, foreign and domestic bond issues, the benefits reaching to all parts of the earth except the place where the money was actually produced by the very lifeblood of the producer.

COMMERCIAL BANKING NO AID TO AGRICULTURE

Of course, this money is still in existence. It has not been worn out or destroyed. A proper exposure of the books of the large financial institutions of this country will show that it is bulging the vaults of the banks of the financial centers. It does not belong to these banks. It is only on deposit with them, and under the present system of commercial banking, with due regard to their depositors and stockholders, these banks cannot loan it on long-time slow security at a low rate of interest.

The net result of all this concentrated accumulation of wealth and cash is like the proverbial snowball rolling down hill—the farther it rolls the larger it grows, and the faster it goes. This financial centralization, like that snowball, is nearing the inevitable time for dissolution when it must burst and go back to small pieces and scatter.

GOVERNMENT AS DECENTRALIZATION AGENCY

The big question before us is how can agriculture be refinanced, what can these big bankers do, and if unwilling, how can Congress act to peaceably and with the least disturbance possible redistribute these funds so that they will find their way back to the farming communities where they can again be returned to the channels of trade and industry? It cannot be solved by Government loans to be repaid through taxation. This would be an unjust penalty on those able to pay and would be confiscatory on those unable to pay. It can be done by the National Government acting as redistributing agent and by putting its credit back of bonds for this accumulated money, and then replace it in the afflicted communities in self-liquidating, long-time, low-interest rate loans to farmers and ranchers and allied industries.

Mr. Speaker, the committee to which this message is referred will have to deal with all of these things, and the question now occurs: What committee shall have the first say on these subjects? The decision, I impress upon you, involves the very sinews and backbone, if not, indeed, the very life of agriculture. Where goes this message, there also goes all legislation on the subject of it.

AGRICULTURE MINDS SHOULD STUDY AGRICULTURE PROBLEMS

This class of legislation must be studied by men of agriculture mind and not by men of banking mind. The theories of men of banking mind have helped to weld the present shackles to the ankles of agriculture, and, mind you, those shackles will not be broken by bankers. It will take agriculture-minded men to do that.

Practically all of the legislation we now have and all the legislation the President nullified by his order of March 27 on agriculture financing went through the various committees on banking and currency. Now, in all fairness and candor—let us not use any loaded dice—are any of those agriculture financing laws a success? Is it not fair to assume from the premise before us that the farmer has had enough law molded and framed and worked out and set up by the bankers?

MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file minority views from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1934

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4589) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I would like to make some agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] as to general debate.

Mr. TABER. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] that we have 1 hour general debate divided equally between the two sides. That should be sufficient, provided it is confined to the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Then, Mr. Speaker, pending my motion to resolve into the Committee of the Whole, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to 1 hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and the other half by me, the debate to be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 4589, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the retrenchment of expenditures, the decrease of appropriations, and especially the reduction of salaries, is one of the most unwelcome and most difficult tasks that can confront a legislative body. It is easy to increase appropriations; it is a very simple matter to raise salaries; and public officials have made lasting reputations for statesmanship by taking the line of least resistance, by drifting with the tide, and adding to appropriations, advancing salaries, and enlarging amounts paid out of the Public Treasury. But when the time comes—as inevitably it must—to reverse the process, those upon whom the burden of the thankless task falls, as it now falls on the President, the Director of the Budget, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] must endure criticism and make a sacrifice, the extent of which few realize or appreciate.

For that reason I desire to call to mind the fact that the reductions proposed in the pending bill are but the natural reaction to the steady increase which has been made from year to year in the annual bill over the past decade, and the amounts of those reductions are insignificant in comparison with the enormous increases made in these same items within the memory of practically every member of the committee. In fact, the increase in the cost of the District government in recent years has been out of all proportion to its growth in wealth and population—a rate of increase unmatched by any comparable city of modern times. That is a strong statement, but one fully justified by the facts. In 1914, at the beginning of the war, we were spending for the maintenance of the District government, in round numbers, a total of $11,000,000. Six years later, in 1920, after we had passed the great period of inflation attending the war and its aftermath, the sum had increased to approximately $15,000,000; but for 1932, in the midst of the greatest economic depression of all time, with a consequent decline in the cost of labor and materials, we expended the stupendous sum of $49,000,000.

In other words, in the 6 years beginning with the war, with every department of the District government operating at high pressure, the city crowded with the sudden influx of temporary employees in the Federal departments and recruits from neighboring military camps, there was an increase of only $4,000,000.

While in the 12 succeeding years coincident with the deflation beginning in 1920 and culminating in 1932, although relieved of the acute problems of war times, we have had an increase of $34,000,000. In comparison with these increases the reductions proposed in this bill are inconsequential.

And this increased growth in expenditure for the District government has been attended by a corresponding increase in public construction in the District, an increase so marked that those of us who have been here for the last 10 years may say as Nero said of Rome, "We found Washington brick and leave it marble." And when the program of construction, now in process of completion, is finished, if Nebuchadrezzar the Magnificient could be transported from his country and his time, and could look out from the battlements of this Capitol over Washington, as he looked out from the parapets of the famous Hanging Gardens over Babylon, he would be consumed with envy as he viewed this city of granite bronze.

Mr. McFARLANE. And aluminum; do not forget the aluminum.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. And aluminum, with its monumental buildings, its beautiful gardens, and the far-reaching vistas of its broad avenues unfolding along the Potomac like an enchanted panorama from the Arabian Nights.

That is as it should be. The Capital of the greatest and most progressive Nation of the world should be the most beautiful and progressive city of the world. [Applause.] I am in fullest accord with that policy, although I cannot subscribe to a plan—even when endorsed by the Fine Arts Commission—which would build in a day a city which should be the product of the years and saddle on the taxpayers of today a burden which should be distributed over a generation.

Every citizen may justly take pride in this city. But in times like these, when retrenchment is the order of the day in every city in the land, Washington should be no exception to the rule and should accept gracefully and gratefully her share of the burden and the sacrifice.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 8 additional minutes.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. GOSS. I cannot find in the hearings anything about the question of public welfare.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If the gentleman will excuse me, we will take that up when we reach it in the bill. I am merely making a preliminary statement at the present time.

Mr. GOSS. I notice there is but one item which has been increased. I wish to get an explanation of it for the benefit of the House.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. With the gentleman's indulgence I will discuss that in just a minute.

In concluding this general statement I should like to emphasize two things: First, that this bill is in the nature of an emergency measure and these drastic retrenchments, I trust, temporary expedients. During the war the French had a phrase with which they answered every complaint. In response to every protest they said, "C'est la guerre." It is the war. So we can answer today in response to the protests that are being made against this bill, "C'est la depression." It is the depression.

Every individual, every municipality, and every corporation and organization, both public and private, is cutting costs and reducing expenses and invoking every possible economy in order to balance their budgets. Washington must do the same and should be thankful that the retrenchment is so mild and so reasonable.

Second, this is an administration measure. It comes direct from the Executive and is a redemption in terms of the pledges made during the recent campaign to reduce the cost of government and balance the Budget. It is in direct and implicit compliance with the mandate of the American people given in the last election to retrench expenditure and reduce taxation and bring our expenses within our income.

I may say further that the bill here presented reduces no item in the bill to a degree which will in any way interfere with the efficient operation of any department of the municipal government. And I wish particularly to emphasize the fact that it is reported to the House by the unanimous vote of the committee and with the harmonious approval of the Bureau of the Budget, representing the executive departments, of the subcommittee which considered the Budget estimates, and of the House Committee on Appropriations which today unanimously directed that it be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

Let me also ask of our friends on the floor and the newspapers of the city the virtue of consistency.

As each message has come from the White House they have insistently admonished us to stand by the President. Let me now ask them in the same spirit that they stand by the President on this bill—the first appropriation bill reported out since he assumed office, and reported practically verbatim as it came from the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I understand a reduction is made in the appropriation for the schools. I also understand that the Superintendent of Schools has assured the committee that this does not mean the reduction of salaries or a curtailment of force. Is this the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I do not recall that the superintendent of schools appeared before the committee, and I have had no statement from him to that effect; but in response to a question when the Commissioners were before us, we were told that, while the reduction was severe, it would in no way materially reduce the efficiency of any department of the government to where it would interfere with its efficient functioning.

Mr. KELLER. Would not destroy it?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The statement was that it would do no material injury.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan 1 minute in which to ask the question he wants to ask.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman from Missouri inform the House to what degree the salaries of the school teachers of the District of Columbia, including the superintendent and principals, have been reduced under this bill in comparison with what they were last year?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. There is a reduction in their salary as there was in the salary of every other official, provided for by the economy bill, a straight blanket reduction of 15 percent. The economy bill takes care of that just as it takes care of the salaries of Members of Congress.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the present bill reduce the salaries of school teachers, principals, and superintendents any more than that?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It makes no reduction in the salary of any official of the District.

Mr. DONDERO. May I say that back in my own State the salaries of school teachers, principals, and superintendents have been reduced as much as 50 percent in order to get along and run the public schools.

Mr. McSWAIN. If the gentleman will permit, in some of the States some of the teachers have not received a cent of money in the last 12 months, except little scrip that they take to some bank and discount if they can, or if there is any bank left open to discount it.

Mr. DONDERO. That applies also to Michigan.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I will say further in response to the question that a recent tabulation of the salaries paid teachers in all the adjoining areas, including Virginia and Maryland, shows that the average salary paid the Washington teacher is more than twice, and sometimes thrice, the salary paid teachers in the territory immediately adjoining the District of Columbia.

Mr. DONDERO. How can we justify the amount they are allowed in this bill if we leave the salaries as they are?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Of course, this bill does not attempt to reach that matter.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

This bill carries very liberal appropriations when you come to consider the whole picture.

In 1923, the appropriation was approximately $24,236,000; in 1924 it was $24,573,000; in 1925 it was $26,455,000; in 1926 it was $34,000,000 and odd; in 1927 it was $34,000,000 and odd; in 1928 it was $36,000,000; in 1929 it was $37,000,000; in 1930 it jumped to $41,000,000; in 1931 it jumped to $48,000,000; in 1932 it was $48,900,000; and in 1933, $44,400,000.

As a result of these large increases in District expenditures the surplus of the District is exhausted.

The figures which I have given you show that back in the heyday of prosperity, in 1923, 1924, 1925, and 1926, we were spending less on the District than we propose to spend under this bill. They show that there are further reasonable reductions to be expected, as we get into this situation and have time to hold committee hearings and run these matters down.

The Federal contribution provided for in this bill is a little over $5,700,000. If it were based upon the same ratio that the Appropriations Committee brought in here in February, it would be $5,300,000. This shows that the District has been treated very liberally. On top of this, the Appropriations Committee directed its chairman to offer amendments to the bill providing for $1,040,000 additional out of the gasoline tax for highways, in the discretion of the President, bringing the total practically up to the conference agreement of last March, and this is to be met out of the gasoline revenues and not out of taxes. It also provided that there might be expended, in the same way, not to exceed $635,000 out of water revenues for repair of the water system.

I believe that all through this bill there are opportunities for further retrenchment, which further study on the part of the Bureau of the Budget can make very productive.

Of course, we were not permitted to reduce salaries beyond the 15 percent that was carried in the economy bill. Frankly, I do not believe it would be desirable to attempt to bring anything of this kind in here so soon after the passage of the economy bill until folks have an opportunity to study the situation and figure it out.

Notwithstanding the fact that I believe the lump-sum appropriation is too high, I have agreed to go along with the committee, because I believe that this budget marks a forward step in cutting down expenses, and if no attempt is made to raise it, I shall not make any attempt to cut it.

Frankly, I shall not feel bound by this position if an attempt is made to raise the Federal contribution.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. There may be proposals subsequent to this one further reducing the budget of the District?

Mr. TABER. If there are not, I shall be very much disappointed because I believe there is a very marked field for further reductions to get it down to the preexpansion basis.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to direct the attention of the Members to the fact that this appropriation bill differs fundamentally from any other appropriation bill that Congress has to consider. In passing upon this bill, we are acting as a town council for the municipality of Washington, and appropriating back to the people of Washington for the operation of the municipal government funds derived directly from local taxation in the District.

This bill has nothing to do with balancing the National Budget. The reasons for curtailing appropriations in the other appropriation bills for national purposes that come before the Congress do not pertain to this bill except incidentally. This money is the money of the people of Washington, derived by local taxation.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman must concede that there is a contribution by the Federal Government to which we owe some obligation.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am not asking to increase that. The taxpayers of the District of Columbia had no hearings on this bill, although they asked for them.

We should keep constantly in mind the fact that we are legislating for the only people in the United States, with the exception of aliens, convicts, and the occupants of lunatic asylums, who are denied the American right to speak for themselves. We are handling the money that is to be raised by the taxation of the voteless American citizens who live in the District of Columbia, and if we do not appropriate all of it, or give them the benefit of reduced taxation so that what is not to be spent need not be taken from them by taxation, this idle money will be amassed in the Treasury as an unusable surplus.

Let us not speed too hastily through this measure. Let us see where we can wisely and judiciously spend the local money that is to be raised by local taxation, giving work to those who need it, preserving our city's schools and libraries and institutions instead of destroying them, and let us make this a balanced budget in fact as well as in theory. The budget that raises more money by taxation of the people than is needed for governmental expenditures is just as unbalanced as a budget that spends more than is raised.

No man in this House has supported by his vote the policies of the administration in the attempt to balance the Budget more consistently than I have, for I have voted for every recommendation that has come from the White House since the session started. But whether we vote for a few thousand more or a few thousand less for the necessary functions of the local government of the District does not affect the balancing of the Federal Budget one jot or tittle.

The District appropriation bill for 1934 passed the House in February, but died in conference with the expiration of the Seventy-second Congress. That bill drastically cut appropriations for the operation of the municipal government of the District. This bill makes further cuts aggregating about $6,000,000. I shall offer amendments at the proper time to restore what I regard as some of the necessary items for the proper and orderly conduct of municipal affairs for the next fiscal year.

The hearings upon the last bill showed that there would be a surplus at the end of the fiscal year of something like $5,000,000. By the drastic cuts in this bill that surplus will be increased to an estimated $9,300,000. These millions of dollars, which will come from the hard-pressed taxpayers but left idle in the Treasury, serve no useful purpose. It will result in the discharge of a large number of municipal workers, depriving them of a livelihood, while a needless surplus of nearly $10,000,000 is accumulating and while necessary municipal public works are being neglected and delayed.

Yet in the very same bill a million and a quarter dollars is appropriated for the relief of the local unemployed. If there is any reason, logic, or sound business in this policy, I ask the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge to state it to the House so that the Members may have a fair presentation of both sides of the question. To me the answer is obvious.

First. The tax rate upon real estate in the District of Columbia should be reduced; and Second. Normal appropriations for needed public works should be continued until this surplus is absorbed.

Under the peculiar governmental set-up for the District of Columbia there are two special funds derived from certain sources, which are allocated by law, and which cannot be used for anything but special purposes. They are:

First. The gasoline tax allocated for street-improvement purposes.

Second. Revenues derived from water service which are confined to expenditures in that department.

As to the first, the gasoline tax, there will be a surplus under this bill of idle money in the next year of $1,800,000, which under the law cannot be used for any purpose except street improvement.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The $1,800,000 will go down to $400,000 under the amendment which the committee is directed to offer.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am glad to be informed that the committee is so liberal.

The Commissioners in the bill which passed the last House specified certain street improvements to carry on the necessary development of the National Capital and at the same time afford employment to the unemployed here, and expend in a normal way the revenues which otherwise must lie idle at a time when they are most needed for unemployment relief.

The amendment which I will offer is, in the language of that bill, seeking to carry out the recommendation of the Commissioners of the local government, which calls for the expenditures of idle money in the gasoline fund, and which does not cost the Federal Government one penny. If my amendment is adopted, it will call for the expenditure on street work in the District of an additional sum of $503,950, coming solely out of local revenues, which cannot be used for any other purpose, which costs the Federal Government nothing, and which must otherwise lie idle in the Treasury.

I do not believe that anyone can successfully deny that this is a sound and logical policy.

With respect to the other special fund, namely, revenues derived from water service, it is estimated that under the present bill there will be created an idle surplus of $1,400,000, derived wholly from fees paid by the taxpayers of Washington for water service, and which cannot be expended for other purposes.

The amounts appropriated in this bill are approximately $580,000 less than the amounts recommended by the appropriation bill in February and passed by the House at that time. This apparent saving comes about by reducing appropriations for needed extensions and improvements of water service, renewal of mains, repairs, and so forth, which are recommended by the District Commissioners.

I hope that the House will give thoughtful consideration to the amendments which I expect to offer to restore these appropriations which will tend to increase employment on public works, and thereby reduce unemployment in the District for the next fiscal year without one dollar's expense to the Federal Government.

If the House will not increase the appropriation, then obviously a much more substantial reduction in the rates of water service should be provided than is contained in the bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will only discuss one phase of this bill, and that is the question which has been asked, "What is the matter with the District government?"

To that question, after intelligent investigation, I want to suggest and place in the RECORD the fact that in 1920 we had in the District of Columbia 437,000 people. In 1930 we had 487,000 people, an increase in the population of the city of 50,000, or 11.4 percent.

In 1920 the total appropriations for the administration of every activity of the District government was $20,072,000. At that time we had 437,000 population. In 1932 the total appropriation for every activity was $48,137,000, or an increase of 140 percent in appropriations, with only an increase of 50,000 in population.

I have received resolution after resolution from civic associations complaining about the contribution made by the Federal Government. Let me review a few of these appropriations.

Public schools, of which we hear complaint, in 1920 had a total appropriation of $3,760,000. In 1932, the appropriation was $13,600,000, an increase of 261 percent in 12 years.

Street and road improvement and repair in 1920 was $1,651,000. In 1932 it was $5,195,000, or an increase of 214 percent in 12 years.

Police activity in 1920, the appropriation was $1,694,000, and in 1932, $3,501,000.

There is no use of my going down the line of these activities, the proportion of enormous increase held throughout the District government service.

What is the matter? The District government is attempting to render too much service to the people of this District for an economical government. One of the gentlemen a while ago said that we want this to be a model government, we want it to dazzle the eye and confuse the brain. I do not want it to do that. I want it to be a government of simplicity, a government of simple utility, a government that is good, that is clean, a government in which law and order are maintained and in which peace and tranquillity are to be found. I want the citizens of all States to come here and say that we have a clean businesslike government here, a government of simplicity, and not of grandeur. If there is anything that appeals to the American heart, it is simplicity, because simplicity is the starting point as well as the goal in the history of cities and of nations. We must retrace our steps and get on an economical basis.

Let me read one or two more of these things. You have heard a lot of talk and some of you have letters in your pocket about public libraries. In 1920 the appropriation for public libraries amounted to $107,810 and in 1932 it amounted to $463,350, or an increase of 330 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman put those in the RECORD.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall put them in, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and also to include a statement showing the per capita governmental cost increase on the people of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the Congress and the taxpayers of the United States on having as their chairman of the Committee on Appropriations my distinguished colleague from Texas, Judge JAMES P. BUCHANAN. He stands for strict economy in governmental expenditures. He is against waste. He is against extravagance. He is against graft. He is a man of good judgment. He is a man of keen intellect. He is a man of great courage. I deem it a distinct honor to serve under him and with him.

He has shown great wisdom in placing this bill in charge of our able friend from Missouri, CLARENCE CANNON, as chairman of the subcommittee framing this bill. There is no man in Washington more familiar with District business than our good friend from Missouri. He digs down to the very bottom of everything. He knows how to get reliable information and how to uncover the facts. Shrewd bureau chiefs across the table cannot overreach him. There is no such thing as being able to influence him to do something that ought not to be done. And the dependable help given to the committee at all times by our good friends, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], has been invaluable.

The Washington newspapers have for a week been proclaiming daily that the committee refused to grant a proper hearing to the Commissioners of the District. That is not the fact. I quote from page 51 of the hearings the following:

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any question in the mind of any of the Commissioners on this subject? I just heard a while ago what was hardly a complaint, but a statement, that you were, perhaps, unduly rushed in making your allocations of the $33,000,000 to the different projects in the District. Now, since you made those allocations under those conditions, has the question occurred to any of you since then as to whether the allocations should be made differently or could be made more advantageously to the District without exceeding the $33,000,000 submitted? If so, this committee will not hesitate a moment to shift the allocations in accordance with what the facts seem to suggest.

Mr. DONOVAN. I desire to make this statement: I believe, and I think the Commissioners will join with me in the statement, that if we spent any further time, we would not make any material change in the figures already submitted here. I do not believe that further study would change those figures.

All three Commissioners of the District of Columbia were present and all acquiesced in the above statement made by Auditor Donovan. Not one asked for any additional hearing. All admitted that the hearings should close. Hence the newspaper criticism is wholly unwarranted.

If you will look into these hearings we held the other day, you will find that the people of Washington are the best treated people in the United States. You must not believe all this falderal you see in the Washington newspapers about the Congress damaging the people of Washington. I do not blame the newspapers of Washington. It is to their interest to get the Congress to appropriate just as many millions of dollars out of the Treasury as they can to be spent in Washington. It helps the business interests, it helps the merchants to take whole advertisements in the newspapers, and when clamoring for larger appropriations they make the people think that they are fighting the people's cause. But they let the people overlook the fact that the more money is spent the more the people will have to pay in taxes. As a result of this bill, do you know what is going to happen? The taxes of every taxpayer in Washington are going to be reduced from $1.70 to $1.50 on the $100, and yet the District will not be hurt at all. We save the money. As a result taxes are reduced.

When we had the District bill up here on the night of March 3, just before the last Congress closed, it will be remembered that we showed you that the bill ought not to pass, and by a big vote of this House the bill was killed. I told you on that night, you who were here at that time, that there could be squeezed out of that bill over $6,000,000 without hurting the people's interests at all. I told you that the Federal contribution was entirely too much, and that it ought to be reduced, and the bill died, and what has happened? The President of the United States has had his Budget committee go over this bill carefully, go over every item in it, and now he has reduced the bill $6,239,447 below the bill that was killed that last night in the last Congress. He has reduced the Federal contribution $1,900,000 below the amount that was carried in that bill we killed on the night of March 3.

Yet every civic and business enterprise in this District is carefully preserved and protected.

Look at the hearings. You will find that in the presence of the three Commissioners I made the auditor admit that in Washington you can take deeds or other documents that would cost several dollars to record in any county of the 48 States, and have same recorded here for 75 cents each.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does not the gentleman know that it was he who put those words into the mouth of the auditor, and that on the very next page of the hearings, page 12, the fees are given and the fee is 15 cents a folio, and nothing that the gentleman has said could possibly happen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to put in the questions put to the auditor and his answers.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And also the fees.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and to extend my remarks by inserting other data.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman has referred to a saving of $6,000,000. His modesty forbids his taking the credit for this saving.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it was due to the splendid, able help of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is due the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to say that a difference arose in conference between him and the retiring chairman of the Senate committee handling the District appropriation in the closing days of the last Congress, and that the gentleman's report to the House of that difference led the House to reject the conference report, and he is truly entitled to the credit for saving this $6,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am not going to take all that credit. I want you to read the splendid unanswerable speech made that night by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] that helped kill that bill. I want you to read the splendid speech of our good colleague, the great Representative from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. He deserves credit also. I do not want to take credit that is due them. It was to the credit of this House that the Membership of this House kept that wasteful and expensive bill from passing that night. You have a President's bill now. The President sent us this bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment I shall be glad to yield. I want the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], who has taken the mantle of our friend, the great Walton Moore, on his shoulders, when he gets up and fights for increases in this bill, to remember he is fighting against the President's bill. This is the President's bill we are asking the House to approve.

The President has asked us to make these cuts. The President has passed upon the bill that was agreed upon in conference. The President has sent this message here and asked us to save these amounts. I want the gentleman from Virginia to answer to his people of Virginia when he tries to change this bill on these cuts. Let him explain to Virginians why in Washington the people do not pay one single thing for planting trees in front of their homes. All the trees are planted at the expense of the District government. They are pruned by the government, at government expense. They are sprayed by the government at government expense. They are looked after and replaced when they die. In Virginia you have to pay for such trees yourself. In Washington the gasoline tax is 2 cents on a gallon. In Virginia it is 5 cents a gallon. Why do Virginians have to pay 3 cents per gallon more than Washingtonians?

The people of the gentleman's district—his constituents in Virginia—pay 5 cents tax on gasoline while his friends in Washington pay 2 cents. In Washington the people do not pay a thing for having the garbage gathered, except the general tax. In the States they have to pay for it.

The people here do not have to pay anything for having their trash gathered. In other cities they do. The people here do not pay anything to have their ashes taken up in the winter, but in other cities they do. The people in the District of Columbia who have owned their property for 30 years have not had to pay one dollar in 30 years for sewer service, but in other States they have to pay so much a month. I have to pay in my home city $2.75 per month on my residence in Abilene, whether I am there or not, for that service. In Washington a family pays $8.75 per year for water. In some cities you pay that much per month. In Washington you get a flat tax rate of $1.70 per $100. That is every tax you have to pay on both personal and real property, with a thousand-dollar personal exemption for your furniture—$1.70 per $100. In some cities of some States it is $3.50 and $4.50, and it even runs up to $6 per $100 in some cities.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I promised to yield to my friend from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] first.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman has answered the question I had in mind.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the gentleman mean to tell the House that the total tax in Washington is $1.70?

Mr. BLANTON. One dollar and seventy cents a hundred on real property and on personal property, and under the savings made in this bill it will be reduced to $1.50 on the $100. In States they have the State and county tax, which in instances is more than the tax in Washington. Then there is the city tax extra; there is the special school tax, and in some instances a special water tax, and an extra sewer tax, and then, in addition to that, we have to pay for gathering all the commodities I have mentioned. In Washington, license tags on automobiles cost only $1, even for the most expensive cars, while in the States you pay from $10 to $40 for same.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. In the District government the Federal Government makes a contribution to the District based on the amount of buildings it has, and out in Virginia, if there is a navy yard or a Government hospital or a mint or something like that, they do not pay any tax at all to the State.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. That is correct. Yet every single piece of Government property in Washington is an asset to the people of Washington. Our chambers of commerce back home spend thousands of dollars in advertising to get people to come to their cities. It is the Government's business and buildings here that attract people to Washington.

When they talk about voteless Washington I want you new colleagues to remember this: When I first came here I thought it was a shame to keep the people in Washington from voting, and I introduced a bill to give them a vote. I had a caucus of Washington people held over in the big caucus room in the House Office Building one night and heard what the people here said about it, and, to my great surprise, the leading interests of this city came up here and said they were against the bill. They said, "We do not want a vote here. You know where the balance of power is in Washington, and we do not want that balance of power to control the elections in Washington. We do not want it." I have said nothing more about a vote for Washington since that time. All that hurrah about voteless Washington is nothing in the world but propaganda to get you to vote the people's money out of the people's Treasury to carry on the civic expenses of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I will now quote from the hearings some of the facts I elicited from Colonel Donovan, the auditor of the District, all three of the District Commissioners being present while he was testifying, to wit (first, as to charges for water):

Mr. DONOVAN. No. There is a flat rate now of $8.75.

Mr. BLANTON. It is $8.75?

Mr. DONOVAN. That is the flat rate which entitles one to 7,500 cubic feet of water. There is an additional charge for use above that.

Mr. BLANTON. But in the ordinary residence for the ordinary family the flat rate is $8.75 a year?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Which is less than a dollar a month. That is all they have to pay unless they use an excessive amount of water.

SERVICES NOT ASSESSED

Now, with regard to sewer connections. Let us assume you own your residence; it has been built and sewer connections have been made. You do not have to pay any more than the original charge as a sewer-service charge, do you?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. No resident has to pay that?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. With regard to the collection of garbage; residents do not pay for that service. That is collected by the city free?

Mr. DONOVAN. Of course, it is all a part of the general tax charge that is made; but there is no special charge made for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. If you will just answer my questions, yes or no, we will get along very much faster. There is no special charge for garbage collection made to residents?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no special charge for trash collections from a residence?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no special charge for ash collections from a residence?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. With regard to the trees that are put out in front of your residence and in front of mine, we do not have to pay anything for those trees put out in front of our residences?

Mr. DONOVAN. No special charge.

Mr. BLANTON. They are sprayed and pruned and looked after and maintained and restored by the city out of the general revenues?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. We do not have to pay any special school tax outside of the $1.70 that we pay, do we?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. We do not have any other special taxes of any kind outside of the $1.70 tax on personal property and the $1.70 tax on real property and the tax on intangibles, do we?

Mr. DONOVAN. Except for paving the streets, paving alleys, paving sidewalks, laying water mains, laying sewers.

Mr. BLANTON. Those expenses are incurred when you first build your residence. But after you have built your residence and the sidewalk is paved, you do not have any more of that kind of expense?

Mr. DONOVAN. When you once pay for it you have entirely paid for it.

Mr. BLANTON. You have paid for it for all time?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. For instance, I purchased a residence here 16 years ago. I have had none of that to pay since, have I?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And I will not have any more in the future, will I?

Mr. DONOVAN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. When you are putting up a new residence to start with you pay only a nominal charge for connecting your water main, is that right?

Mr. DONOVAN. For connecting from the main to the house, that is entirely paid by the owner.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean connecting out to the curb.

Mr. DONOVAN. For the construction of the main itself, my recollection is the charge is about $3 a front foot.

Mr. BLANTON. And when the street is once made, you never thereafter have to pay any more for that purpose?

Mr. DONOVAN. Provided you have paid the assessment once.

Mr. BLANTON. Then when the street needs repaving or repairing, the city general tax covers that?

Mr. DONOVAN. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. So that when you once pay out those charges you do not have to do as you would have to in Texas and Missouri and in Alabama—you do not have to pay new assessments every time there is repaving to be done, do you?

Mr. DONOVAN. Not if you have paid the assessment once.

TAX EXEMPTIONS

Mr. BLANTON. With regard to exemptions, how much is each family allowed as an exemption on personal property?

Mr. DONOVAN. $1,000 for household furnishings.

Mr. BLANTON. That comes off before they pay any tax?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Then on what is left they pay $1.70?

Mr. DONOVAN. On each hundred dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. $1.70 a hundred; yes. That rate is the same both as to personal property and as to real property?

Mr. DONOVAN. There is no exemption on real property.

Mr. BLANTON. But as to the rate of $1.70, it applies to both?

Mr. DONOVAN. The rate of $1.70 applies to both real estate and tangible personal property.

Mr. BLANTON. That used to be $1.30 and $1.20 and 90 cents, did it not? At one time it was as low as 90 cents, was it not?

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not recall it ever having been as low as 90 cents.

Mr. BLANTON. Was it not 90 cents when I first came here, 16 years ago?

Mr. DONOVAN. I am afraid not; let me see what it has been.

Mr. BLANTON. Put that in the record later, without taking up the time of the committee now.

Mr. DONOVAN. I have the information available here, and I will insert it in the record.

TAX RATES SINCE 1920

Mr. BLANTON. Insert in the record the various mutations of tax rates.

Mr. DONOVAN. Very well.

AUTOMOBILE TAXES

Mr. BLANTON. With regard to automobile taxes, in some States it costs $24 to register and get your license tags for, say, a Pierce Arrow, on up to a pretty high charge for a Rolls-Royce. You can register a Rolls-Royce or Pierce Arrow or a Cadillac here in the District of Columbia and get your license tags for $1; is that right?

Mr. DONOVAN. You can get your tags here for $1. Then, of course, you pay a personal tax.

Mr. BLANTON. You pay the personal tax everywhere. I am talking about the license-tag tax. Elsewhere the people pay $20, $30, $40, while you pay $1 here in the District.

Mr. DONOVAN. Correct.

Mr. BLANTON. There has been no move to make that a higher tax?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes. The Mapes committee reported out a bill providing for a tax on automobiles by weight.

Mr. BLANTON. But that has never been passed?

Mr. DONOVAN. It passed the House.

Mr. BLANTON. But it has not become a law?

Mr. DONOVAN. It has not become a law.

I wish to say to my new colleagues that they must not forget that this 10 miles square between Virginia and Maryland is the Government's place of business. It is set apart for this Government. It is the Government's office. Our forefathers and the framers of our Constitution saw to it that we had a place to carry on the business of this Nation. Do not let any Washington City officials ever get any control on this 10 miles square. When I came here I thought it was an outrage because we had the Park Police and we had the Capitol Police and the Senate Police, and we had this kind of police and that. I said, "Let us make it all one Metropolitan Police." Then, when I began to study about it and came to confer with the older heads, the men of wisdom, I saw I was wrong.

I saw the necessity for this great Government to have its own constabulary, because the time might come when there could be a conflict of interest between the people of Washington clamoring for rights that they should not have here in this 10 miles square. Every time a man moves to Washington he comes here knowing that this is the seat of government. He comes here knowing that he cannot vote unless he keeps up his residence in some State. Every time a person moves to Washington to live he must take cognizance of that fact, that we are not going to turn loose the rights of this Government to the people here who have gotten rich on the Government.

I know some lots here in Washington which when I first came here in 1917 were worth only $100. Today some of them are worth $100,000 because of money the Government has spent here.

In addition to this bill there are half a dozen appropriation bills that provide large sums of money which is spent in Washington for the interest of Washington. The deaf and dumb asylum in Washington is maintained for the benefit of this city. Howard University is maintained for the colored people, a necessary institution, one which furnishes nurses, physicians, dentists, school teachers, and colored ministers for the colored people, and every dollar it gets is contributed to it by this Government and is spent here by that university. Another instance is St. Elizabeths Hospital, one of the biggest insane asylums in the world. The Washington people get just as much benefit out of it as the other people of the United States. The Federal Government furnishes the courts for this great city, from the police court up, and gives Washington all the fees. All the judges are paid by the people of the United States. Look at the many public parks and places of amusement. Yet these newspapers are not satisfied. They hammer us who stand and speak for the people. They hammer on us all the time; but let me tell you this: You may not get a position on the front page of Washington's newspapers, but you will have the approval of your own conscience, and of your own heart, and of your constituents back home.

The former great leader in the other end of the Capitol who was responsible for this bill being raised from $20,000,000 to $48,000,000 a year is not there any more. His people back home found out he was fighting for the people of Washington and forgetting the people of Connecticut and they kept him at home. Any other Senator at the other end of this Capitol who attempts to act against the interests of the people of the United States in behalf of the people of the District for a few front-page mentions in the Washington newspapers will be found out sooner or later by his people and be kept at home.

I want you new colleagues of ours who are not familiar with this question to get some of the records from the Mapes committee, find out what that committee, after careful, scientific investigation, reported. You will see that this Government has been a big spender for the District. The long, hairy arm of this District, reached out constantly by the Washington newspapers and its satellites into the Public Treasury, has every year pulled out of the people's hard-earned tax money millions of dollars and spent them here in Washington. We must keep control of this situation. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] 3 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I have no prejudice either for or against the people of this District. I pride myself that I have an open mind, and notwithstanding some very unpleasant experiences with the realtors of Washington, I believe I can render justice to all. I shall not enter into a general discussion of this bill in the limited time at my disposal, but let me call your attention to the manner in which the Congress often passes on the financial affairs of this District and how prone they are to acquire misinformation.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who has just spoken, referred to the hearings, and said he compelled the auditor of the District to admit that it costs only 75 cents to record a deed or instrument in the office of the recorder of deeds, whether it consisted of 1 page or 100 pages.

The truth is that Mr. Donovan, the auditor, knew nothing about it and took for granted that my amiable and good friend from Texas knew all about it. The fact of the matter was that Mr. Donovan, the auditor, could hardly be expected to know anything about it, because the recorder of deeds in Washington is an independent office. On the very next page—page 11—of the hearings, as it happens, section 552 of the Code of Laws of the District is set forth in full, and I invite your attention to it. This provides as follows:

> For filing, recording, and indexing or making a certified copy of any instrument containing 200 words or less, 50 cents, and 15 cents for each additional 100 words, to be collected at the time of filing when the copy is made.

So it was certainly impossible for anybody to file an instrument of a large number of pages for the little fee of 75 cents without violating the law.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, may I emphasize that this bill is the bill recommended by the Director of the Budget? Certainly no Republican is going to suggest any increase. Personally, I believe this bill can be decreased. There are between 15 and 20 independent bureaus or offices in the District of Columbia that are not under the jurisdiction of the District Commissioners. This, from an administrative point of view, is a ridiculous situation and I believe the government of the District of Columbia can be very much simplified with great resultant saving to the Government.

We have given the President of the United States the authority to make changes in the Federal Government, to consolidate bureaus, commissions, and independent establishments. I believe if similar authority were given the President in the matter of the government of the District of Columbia great simplification could be had, increased efficiency, and a decreased cost of government in the District. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The committee considered that, and most of the committee, if not all, thoroughly agree with the position taken by the gentleman from New York and would like to have done it, but it is legislation, and I am one chairman who intends to try to follow the rules of the House and not bring in legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. I am in very thorough accord with my chairman and only make this statement to bring it to the attention of the proper legislative committee. I want to express the hope that the District of Columbia Legislative Committee will see fit in the near future to discuss legislation along the lines I am suggesting in the interest of efficiency and economy. The Appropriations Committee are in agreement and hope that the necessary legislation can be passed.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of attention to what the gentleman from Texas had to say about Washington being the land of milk and honey, where they supposedly lay your sidewalks, haul your garbage, and plant your trees without cost, and where everything, supposedly, happens at Government expense.

If this be true, I should like to inquire into the other half of the picture. Since I have been here I have been informed that the Mayflower Hotel is in receivership. I have been informed that nearly all of the hotels and apartment houses here are in receivership. Why is it, if everything is provided for the people of Washington, D.C., at a tax rate of $1.70—and, incidentally, it was not explained that that tax rate was levied on the full, fair cash value rather than on a fictitious assessed value such as obtains elsewhere—I am simply asking as a matter of information why there is all this economic hardship in Washington, D.C., the land of milk and honey?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, any revenue (not including the proportionate share of the United States in any revenue arising as the result of the expenditure of appropriations made for the fiscal year 1924 and prior fiscal years) now required by law to be credited to the District of Columbia and the United States in the same proportion that each contributed to the activity or source from whence such revenue was derived shall be credited wholly to the District of Columbia, and, in addition, $5,700,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be advanced July 1, 1933, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia, namely:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 2, I move to strike out the words "District of Columbia and the United States."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "District of Columbia and the United States."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of my friend from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], I want to answer his question. The reason you find a great many hotels and large apartment houses and office buildings in the District of Columbia in trouble is on account of fraudulent manipulation of trusts. The owners will build a building for, say, $500,000. They will put on a first trust of $300,000; then they will put on a second trust of $300,000 more, $100,000 of which is clear velvet; and then they will put on a third trust of $400,000, making $500,000 of net, clear velvet. Then they will sell it at a profit, and finally the bubble bursts. [Laughter.]

That is a fair illustration. If the gentleman had been here during the last 10 years and had known of the manipulations of just one company here, the F. H. Smith Co., he would have answered his own question.

It is this unfair, fraudulent sale of worthless stock and worthless mortgages on the marts of the country outside of Washington that has not only wrecked the new buyers of buildings here but has wrecked holders of second and third trusts all over the country. We are trying to squeeze out all of this manipulation. As a matter of fact, there ought not to be any second mortgage, and there ought not to be any third or fourth mortgage for the people to be swindled with. In some cases they have even put on fifth and sixth trusts here. This is what we are trying to stop.

I may say to my friend from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] in talking about the testimony of Auditor Donovan, if he will look into the record he will find that I requested Mr. Donovan to state if there were not a time when the tax rate here was 90 cents on the $100. He said he would have to look it up, and I told him to put in the figures, but he did not go back far enough when he put in the figures, but started with 1920. I am going to make him dig that up this evening, and I am going to put in the RECORD later the figures showing a time when there was a tax rate of less than $1 on the $100.

I want to say to my friend over here that this is the only city in the United States that has not some bonded indebtedness. Do you know why? It is because the Government has paid all the money for things for which the cities usually issue bonds. There is no bonded indebtedness here. It is the great Treasury of the United States that for years has been taking care of the city of Washington.

I am also going to put in the exact facts about the recorder of deeds office, I will state to my friend from New York. I am going to make them get out those facts, because I have been in that office myself.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is in the hearings.

Mr. BLANTON. He merely cited the law. He cited it specially as to issuing certified copies. I was not speaking about certified copies; I was talking about filing deeds for record and having them recorded.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is covered by section 552 of the District Code.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to show you what they actually charge there. I was in that office and I saw one of these realtors that my friend from New York referred to come in and hand the recorder a handful of instruments to be recorded. Some of them apparently were of good size. I heard the clerk tell this man that they were 75 cents apiece and I saw them paid for right through the window. You cannot beat actual experience. When I check up a bureau here in Washington, I check it up with my own eyes, and I want to tell you now that every single bureau of the District government is overmanned at least 50 percent. You can just take 50 percent of the clerical power out of every bureau here and not hurt it if you will make the rest of them work a full honest day's work.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. McFARLANE. The statement of the gentleman from Virginia a while ago was to the effect, as I understood it, that the taxpayers of the city of Washington are paying in a surplus, leaving the impression with us that they are self-sustaining. I notice in the first paragraph of the bill here we are appropriating $5,700,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Instead of the $9,000,000 that the Senate tried to force us to appropriate. We have thus saved for the taxpayers of the United States $3,300,000 on that one item alone.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

As to this matter of fees in the offices of the recorder of deeds and of the recorder of wills, they are not within the discretion of any clerk or of any of the employees who are employed in these offices. The fees are provided by the Code of the District of Columbia, or, in other words, by the Congress.

After the very interesting colloquy that the gentleman from Texas had with the auditor, Mr. Donovan, Mr. Donovan subsequently put in the hearings an extract from the code covering the fees. This is section 552, and provides, as I read the text:

For recording, indexing, or making certified copies of any instrument containing 200 words or less, of 50 cents and 15 cents for each additional 100 words, to be collected at the time of filing or when the copy is made.

So if the gentleman from Texas says he was in the office of the recorder of deeds and saw this big bunch of legal instruments left there for recording, which would have cost so much in Texas, and that they only charged 75 cents for each of them, notwithstanding the number of pages which they contained, the man in charge of the office clearly violated the law, and I challenge the gentleman from Texas to pursue his statement to its logical conclusion.

Mr. BLANTON. I stated what I saw with my own eyes and what I heard with my own ears in the office of the recorder of deeds. The realtor who handed in the package of instruments paid an average of 75 cents each for all of them. I am going to telephone that office and find out whether or not they are collecting the lawful recording fees, or collecting a flat rate for each instrument.

Mr. GRIFFIN. With all due respect to the gentleman from Texas, I think that he was mistaken, and that those instruments were not recorded for 75 cents, but they were recorded at the price fixed by the statute.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: On page 2, line 9, after the word "Columbia", insert the following: "and the tax rate in effect in the fiscal year 1934 on real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia may be fixed by the Commissioners as to prevent the accumulation of any unnecessary surplus of local revenues above what is herein appropriated."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is legislation on an appropriation bill and is a change of existing law.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment is merely to declare the policy of Congress. It is not offered as substantive law; it is merely advising the Commissioners that it is the expressed policy of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the duty of the legislative committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia is clearly legislation subject to a point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used for or in connection with the preparation, issuance, publication, or enforcement of any regulation or order of the Public Utilities Commission requiring the installation of meters in taxicabs until such regulation or order shall have been approved by Congress: Provided, That this prohibition shall not be construed to affect any order or part of an order of such Public Utilities Commission other than with respect to the requirement of the installation of such meters.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, strike out everything beginning with line 21, up to and including line 4 on page 7.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, this provision that I ask to be stricken out of the bill to my mind is manifestly legislation. It has been in the last three bills, and the point of order has been raised against it, but technically it has been able to evade the point of order and so is retained in the bill.

However, when the bill was before the Senate the last time, the Senate committee, after the hearings, struck out this provision of the bill. If there is anything to clinch the argument against this provision, the experience we had in the Capital during inauguration seems to me to be that clinching argument.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me say to the gentleman that this provision was agreed to in conference.

Mr. HARLAN. Yes; but it was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; here is the clerk of the conference committee, and he will tell you that it was agreed to in conference.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It was included in the House bill, but it was not included in the Senate bill. The Senate conferees receded and it remained in the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. That is my statement, and that was the statement I first made.

Mr. BLANTON. Here is what happened: The Senate first struck out this provision of the House bill; then it reversed its action, and amended the House provision and passed it. In conference the House conferees accepted the Senate amendment, and this provision is just the one agreed to in conference.

Mr. HARLAN. There are now about 5,000 taxicabs roaming on the streets of the District of Columbia, with over one third of their time not used in hauling fares. The Utility Commission passed an ordinance requiring them to have meters. These metered cabs would charge 25 cents for the first 2 miles, and 10 cents a mile after that, the idea being to do away with this absurd, silly zoning system that we have in this District. It is not a law, but it is just an agreement between the taxicab drivers and the companies. There is no way of enforcing it. We simply have anarchy in the District so far as taxicabs are concerned.

The Commission passed an ordinance that would make order out of chaos in this thing. The ordinance was attacked in the court, and the court sustained the ordinance, not only on the legal side, but as to the basic factual reasons therefor, and here we come in with a restriction such as is included in this bill and hamstring the Commission in enforcing the ordinance. It was suggested at the last session that they wanted this provision because they did not want our people profiteered upon during the inauguration. There was not a 20-cent cab in the business that I saw that did not take down its 20-cent sign during the inauguration, and that did not exploit everybody who came into this District. One constituent of mine paid $12.50 to ride down to Mount Vernon and back during the inauguration, and day after day there was no restriction, no control over them and the people coming in here not knowing this zoning system, this purely arbitrary arrangement between the taxicab companies, got into disputes and fights and all kinds of disturbances. The number of accidents that happen in the streets from these drivers working 14 and 16 and 18 hours a day to eke out a living on this 20-cent fare is a disgrace to this Capital—just to save 5 or possibly 10 cents on a taxicab fare. It seems to me that we have gone far enough in that. I wish I had the time to read some excerpts from the hearing before the Senate committee. The taxicab drivers do not want this, and when this was before the Court, the Court said it was nothing but a method of exploiting labor and that is all it is.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I want the chairman of the committee and the clerk of the committee to listen to what I have to say. Here is what happened: We put this amendment to prevent meters in the House bill. The bill went to the Senate. At first the Senate struck it out. Then the Senate reconsidered it on the floor and amended it in certain particulars and put it back in the bill, and in conference we agreed to the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, that is correct. I had in mind another amendment when I made the statement in response to the inquiry from the gentleman from Ohio. This proposition was reconsidered on the floor of the Senate and agreed to in the form in which it appears in this bill, and was so approved by the managers on the part of the two Houses in conference. The gentleman from Texas is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. And this is the very proposition that was carried that was agreed to on the Senate floor first, and then in conference.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Precisely.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you the reason for it. When General Patrick, the chairman of the Utilities Commission, was before our committee, we said, "Now, General, when Congress adjourns, if we do not put this provision back into this bill to stop you from installing meters, will you tote fair with Congress and not install meters while we have gone home?" He said no; that he was going to install them. Then I said to him, "Then, General Patrick, if we want to stop you from installing meters, it will be necessary to put such a provision in the bill." He replied that we would have to stop him by such a provision. Then the committee decided they would stop him, as they were not going to let him put 1,500 ex-service men driving taxicabs here out of business.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Are there any of those 1,500 ex-service men who want this ordinance defeated; and if so, where have they testified and said so?

Mr. BLANTON. They have testified many times before us in our offices when we were investigating the matter and have written us hundreds of letters. I have been so told by several hundred of them myself when I would stop them on the street. I made it my business day after day when Congress was not in session to stop them on the street and ask, "Are you an ex-service man?" "Yes." "Did you serve in France?" "Yes." "Are you satisfied with the present arrangement?" "Yes." And they would say: "I do not want you to let them put meters on, because they will run me out of business." Some said "I stayed here in Washington 2 or 3 years without making a dollar, and now I am driving a taxi and making $4 or $5 or $6", and some said $7 a day.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. And the members of the committee are in receipt of many letters from individual drivers to that effect.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I have a number of them in my office. They say "Do not let them put meters in, it is the big companies, the monopolies, who are trying to run us out." The speech that my friend from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] made a while ago is almost word for word what was contained in the page advertisements that these monopolies had in the Washington newspapers not long ago. How on earth can a poor devil who cannot make a living pay for a full-page advertisement in the Washington Herald or the Washington Times or the Washington Post or the Star or the News? They had a full-page ad in these papers about this very provision that you have in here to protect these ex-service men of this District.

They have a right to make a living here in Washington. If you did not put in this provision, you would see a taxicab regulation here to require meters. That would run 1,500 ex-service men out of business. Then you would see the rates go up. They would put in meters, and you would get in an automobile and ride down to the Washington Hotel and, instead of paying 20 cents, they would charge you a dollar, or you would ride out to the Roosevelt Hotel and they would charge you $1.50. You would say, "You ought to charge me only 25 cents." The taxi driver would reply: "Pay me." Are you going to stand there and argue with a taxicab driver? No. You will pay what he charges. You have to dig up the money and pay it. We do not want a condition here that will rob our visiting constituents and the people of Washington every day.

Go down to these departments, call the employees into the assembly room, and ask them whether they want this 20-cent taxicab fare to continue. One hundred percent they will tell you they do. You have a lawyer here known as the "people's counsel" paid for by Congress, paid a big salary to represent the interests of the people of Washington. That lawyer has appeared before our committees. He has appeared before the Commissioners time and again, representing the people of this District, saying, "We do not want this provision changed." I hope you will leave it in the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 2, noes 62,

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For personal services, $68,000.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take up the time of the Committee for 5 minutes to call attention to the fact that last night when I returned home I found an engraved envelope addressed to my wife and myself, inviting us to the Auditorium to attend what seems to me to be a beer-drinking contest at midnight on Friday. I have taken the matter up with the Commissioners. I think it would be an outrage if the District Commissioners permit this affair to go on. [Applause.] I have been just as anxious to do away with prohibition as any Member in the House. I like a glass of beer. I want a glass of good beer, and we have provided a way to get a glass of good beer, but if we permit such things as this to go on, in time there will be a reaction, beer will be taken away from us, and there will be no repeal of the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.]

Now, this affair starts at 12 o'clock. What is going to happen before 12 o'clock? There will be a lot of people out on a lark, and by the time they get to the Auditorium at 12 o'clock they will be full of gin, Maryland rye, and Virginia corn, and they will get a bottle or two of beer and they will be drunk, not on the beer, but on the gin, the corn, and the rye, and it will go out all over the country that people were drunk in the city of Washington by drinking a few bottles of beer.

I mention this on the floor of the House today so that it will come to the attention of the Commissioners. I have written them a letter calling their attention to the affair, and I urge them not to permit this to occur. In the first place, the promoters are not entitled to a license under the law. Now they propose to give it away, for they are charging $3, and as an added attraction they say: "All you can eat and drink for nothing." They should not be permitted to get around the law. [Applause.] Where are they going to get any good beer by 12 o'clock Friday that will be fit to drink?

You have one brewery in Washington; and if this brewery is going to be a party to violating the law the first night it is in force, the brewery should lose its license. Frankly, I never did like Washington beer. I preferred the beer that came from other cities; but regardless of that, no one can stay within the law and sell beer to the promoters of this affair, because a brewery can only sell to a distributor, and I cannot conceive that the ones responsible for arranging this so-called "entertainment" will be in possession of a license.

I want to again express the hope that the District Commissioners and the police department will see that the promoters, whoever they may be, are not permitted to carry on Friday night as they intend to carry on according to their invitation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For personal services, $60,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRIFFIN: On page 9, line 25, strike out "$60,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$63,924."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was originally before the House I offered a similar amendment to increase the appropriation for salaries in the office of the Register of Wills from $60,000 to $68,000, which was the amount that was allowed by the Budget. I do not expect to get very far with this amendment, but I am offering it for the RECORD, and I think the Members at least ought to have an opportunity to listen to the facts—that is, those who are interested. Since the Budget was adopted we have had the economy bill, and if we followed its program it would have taken 15 percent off the amount, the same as was done with all of the other bureaus and departments of the Government. I think the committee made a little miscalculation here. Fifteen percent would bring the appropriation from $68,940 down to $63,924, which is the amount I am asking in my amendment. If the bill is passed providing for $60,000, it will mean a reduction of 22½ percent in this particular agency of the Government.

I want to again call your attention to the fact that the office of register of wills yields a profit every year to the Government. Last year its receipts were $93,000 on an expenditure for salaries of $68,000, and the business of the office is increasing from day to day. It is greater now than it ever was before.

This is a very poor time, it seems to me, to decrease the efficiency of the office and to throw men out into the pool of unemployment. I am informed by the register of wills that if this reduction of 22½ percent instead of 15 percent is insisted upon, he will be compelled to throw out three of his employees. I do not think this is the time for the Government of the United States to be so picayunish as to insist upon throwing working people out of employment.

The whole thing is inconsistent. I think, Mr. Chairman, we should give these people a chance to efficiently perform public business. This is one of the most efficient offices in the city of Washington. Let us compare this office with the office of recorder of deeds, which, has lost, according to the hearings, $45,000 a year. The office of the register of wills yields a profit to the District of over $20,000 a year.

If the question of fees is raised again, as it was a few moments ago, I call attention to section 1111 of the District Code, which provides that the fees for the recording of all papers per folio is 15 cents; that is, 15 cents for every 100 words. So the misinformation which has been circulated around here about recording papers of hundreds of pages for 75 cents ought to be stopped right now. Here is the Code of the District, which gives the facts which ought to stop it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I may say in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York that this exact figure was agreed upon when the bill was last before the House. An amendment was offered—by the gentleman from New York himself, as I recall—proposing to increase the appropriation provided for in this item. We covered the whole subject fully at that time; and after exhaustive debate, the House, first on a division and then by a teller vote, put it at exactly this figure.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Why was the additional 7½ percent taken off above the 15 percent under the economy bill? By reducing this appropriation to $60,000 there is being taken away from this particular agency of the Government 22½ percent.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I may say to the gentleman from New York that, with the exception of the two reductions with which he is familiar, the committee approved the bill as it came to us from the Bureau of the Budget, as he will observe from an examination of the Budget estimates.

Mr. GRIFFIN. We are not obliged to follow the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. But, as the gentleman is aware, it has been the policy of the Committee on Appropriations throughout the last Congress, and so far in this Congress, not to exceed the Budget estimates. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity for the office losing a single man under the provisions of this bill if they use the administrative furlough. Or if they do not chose to take a furlough, they would have to retire at most only 3 out of their 35 employees. It is the opinion of unbiased observers that this department is overmanned, and the remaining 33 employees should be able and willing to handle the work at a salary cut of 15 percent when employees in private industry are accepting cuts of from 40 percent to 60 percent.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I find on page 8 of the report that the Budget estimate was $68,490; that it passed the House at $68,490; and that the conferees agreed at $68,490.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Possibly the gentleman is reading from the wrong column. Sixty thousand dollars was the amount agreed on in the reduced estimates we received from the Budget, as the gentleman will note if he looks under the proper heading. Therefore, even if they decided not to resort to administrative furloughs, it would bring them down to a figure which would still be above that paid in comparable cities.

Mr. GRIFFIN. What I am getting at is that there seems to be an error in the calculation. Fifteen percent taken from $68,490 does not leave $60,000 but $63,924, exactly what I provide in my amendment.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman doubtless has in mind the economy bill which made a blanket reduction of 15 percent in all salary items. No attempt was made to follow any specific percentage of reduction in formulating this bill. Each item was considered separately and reduced to a greater or lesser degree as circumstances required.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the meat of this seems to be that nobody says more is needed to do the work than the committee has provided. Why should we give them any more?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is it not a fact that no one from this office was called to ascertain what they wanted? The hearings do not disclose that any effort was made to find out what they wanted.

Mr. TABER. That is so, but the matter had been fully developed by the District Subcommittee in January and February.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. At that time it was developed exhaustively.

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word so that I may answer the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Theodore Cogswell, the register of wills, is as good a friend of mine as he is of the gentleman from New York. He is a bully good fellow and I know how anxious he is to get this extra $8,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is only $3,000.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman spoke of $68,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That was the Budget recommendation.

Mr. BLANTON. From a former Budget, not this one. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is one of our most loved Members. I have served with him a long time. I think a lot of him. He fights earnestly for everything he thinks is right. He is earnestly in favor of this matter because his friend is interested in it.

Now, when this bill was before the last Congress, just before we adjourned, the gentleman from New York made a valiant fight to increase this item above $60,000. He got on this floor and spoke for it earnestly. We had a record vote and the House voted against it. Then he called for tellers and by a decisive vote of the tellers the House voted against it. They then had all of the facts before them.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The teller vote was 71 to 69.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but the House voted against it. And our friend, Cogswell, had been up here to see us. He had been in my office. He had been in the gentleman's office. He had been in other offices lobbying for it. I went over the matter carefully. I could see where there was an overmanning not only of his office but of every other bureau office in Washington.

Under my friend's theory, if this office took in $1,000,000, we ought to let it spend $1,000,000 in expenses. I can remember when county clerks were on the fee system; a county clerk in a good-sized city who ought to be getting a salary of about $2,000 a year was, on investigation, found to be getting $75,000 a year. So the fee system was stopped, and officers are now paid definite salaries.

I have communicated with the recorder of deeds and find that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is correct in his statement that under the law the proper charge for recording deeds and other instruments is 50 cents for the first 200 words and 15 cents for each additional hundred words. I therefore presume that when the realtor handed in the bunch of instruments and paid for them an average of 75 cents each that it just so happened that all together, some short and some long, they averaged 75 cents under the fees authorized by law, as it is to be presumed that the lawful charge was made.

The register of wills and his employees all get salaries. The fees charged by his office are assets belonging to the people. Such fees should not be dissipated. They should not be wasted in paying unnecessary clerks and in unnecessary expenses.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman mean to imply that the register of wills is collecting fees personally?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIFFIN. He is paid a salary, is he not?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. My friend said the office was taking in more than was paid out. Certainly, you would expect an office of this kind to take in more than it pays out, and the people are entitled to whatever the office takes in as assets, not as expenses.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It goes to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend will go down to these bureaus in Washington, he will be convinced that many employees are not busy half the time. They ought to get busy. The man in charge ought to fire half of them and put the other half to work. Then they would be doing something of real value. If they worked as hard as my friend from New York works, you could take more than three of them off the pay roll.

Now, this is the President's budget. This is not our Budget, this is not from the Committee on Appropriations, it is from the President of the United States, and it says:

Communication from the President of the United States.

It says:

The White House, March 27, 1933.

It says:

I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress the following estimate:

for this bill, and the President puts in this bill his limit of $60,000 for this particular office.

Who am I to say the President is wrong? Who is the gentleman from New York to say the President is wrong? Are we following BLANTON or GRIFFIN or are we following the President? I am following the President of the United States, and I am sure my friend from New York is going to do the same thing, because he is a loyal, patriotic Democrat. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman mean to imply that the President made the calculation of 15 percent on the Budget figures of $68,000 and arrived at $60,000?

Mr. BLANTON. Do not you ever believe the President does not know what he is doing down there. He is giving us the first efficient White House administration we have had since the days of Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. And he has the courage to do what he thinks is right. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 10, noes 36.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I object to the vote on the ground of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for 5 minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman think he can conclude in 5 minutes?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I have just introduced a resolution, part of which I am going to read:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to appoint a committee of five Members of the House of Representatives to investigate the causes of the disaster and destruction of the United States Navy dirigible, Akron, off Barnegat Light on the morning of April 4, 1933, with heavy loss of life.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will act promptly. I do not give a tinker's darn whether my resolution is adopted or not, but I hope the majority will put in a similar resolution and provide for an immediate House investigation of this tragedy.

We have already lost 3 out of 4 of these lighter-than-air ships, the Roma, the Shenandoah, and the Akron, with many casualties. The reason I am impelled to speak at the present time is this:

When the Akron was being built, reliable information was received that there was sabotage being conducted by certain employees. It developed that an ex-officer of the Austrian navy was employed upon the Akron and that he was sabotaging on his job.

Department of Justice agents were sent there to investigate. Although the Department of Justice has no authority whatever to investigate Communist activities, it has authority to protect public property. Two very able agents of the Department of Justice went there, and they practically lived with this Austrian ex-lieutenant. They became his best friends and associates. They went to the job with him, they worked with him, and they made a report that is now on file with the Department of Justice in regard to the sabotage in the construction of the Akron, which is the most extraordinary report made by any agents of the Department of Justice I have ever read. These agents said that they attended Communist meetings with this former officer, and that he was an avowed Communist; that he told them that he was sabotaging; that he was cutting halfway through bolts and different parts of the framework. As chairman of the committee to investigate Communism I was given the privilege of reading this report, but as far as I remember it was never made public.

I believe the report should have been made public 2 years ago, because it goes into some important facts in regard to the construction of this airship. Later on, a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs looked into the construction of the Akron, but they did not call before them either of the two agents of the Department of Justice who had made this investigation and developed the facts upon which they had made their report to the Department of Justice. It is time that this report be made public as the American people are entitled to know the facts, and in my opinion, the two agents whose names I have forgotten are also entitled to the commendation of the Congress and the gratitude of our people for the efficient, difficult, and courageous investigation they made even to attending Communist secret meetings at considerable risk to themselves.

Only this afternoon we find by special bulletin in the evening paper the announcement that—

The naval semidirigible J–3, out of Lakehurst Naval Air Station in search of the Akron wreckage, crashed into the sea 1,000 yards from shore at 1:45 o'clock this afternoon and its crew of five men were killed.

I am not stating that there was sabotage in either case, but I think the whole matter should be investigated from the very beginning of the construction of the Akron, and that the facts should be submitted to Congress and the American people, in order to determine what our future policy should be. I do not believe in hiding such information from the people. There is often too much secrecy and mystery attached to governmental matters that are not warranted and facts withheld from the public that they are entitled to know and could make good use of.

In the report of the subcommittee on aeronautics of the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted just 1 year ago, one member of the committee refused to sign the report because he thought that the Akron was unfit and should not be used. That was, in effect, the statement made by Representative BOLAND, still a Member of this House, who was a witness to the accident that occurred to the Akron while anchored at Lakehurst, N.J., on February 22, 1932.

We have the responsibility in the House to ascertain the facts, and I hope if a committee is created it will have at least 1 member from the Naval Affairs Committee, 1 from the Committee on Military Affairs, 1 from the Appropriations Committee, and 1 from the Judiciary Committee, which latter committee has control of legislation connected with sabotage and communism. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Northwest: Thirty-first Street, Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to K Street and South Street, Thirty-first Street to Wisconsin Avenue, $7,400.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: On page 17, line 7, strike out the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Northeast: Benning Road, Culvert to Kenilworth Avenue, $69,000;

"Northwest: Michigan Avenue, North Capitol Street to Columbia Road; Park Place, Hobart Place to approximately 200 feet north of Columbia Road; Hobart Place, Fifth Street to Michigan Avenue and Fifth Street, Harvard Street to Hobart Place, $57,000;

"Northwest: Fourteenth Street, Juniper Street to Kalmia Road, $15,000;

"Northwest: For the widening to 70 feet and repaving the roadway of Thirteenth Street, Massachusetts Avenue to Logan Circle, including the necessary replacement and relocation of sewers, water mains, fire-alarm and police-patrol boxes, $75,000: Provided, That in widening and repaving this roadway 40 percent of the entire cost thereof shall be levied against and collected from the owners of the abutting property in the manner provided in the act approved February 20, 1931 (46 Stat. pp. 1197–1199). The owners of abutting property also shall be required to modify, at their own expense, the roofs of any vaults that may be under the sidewalks or parking on said street if it be found necessary to change such vaults to permit of the roadway being widened;

"For grading streets, alleys, and roads, including construction of necessary culverts and retaining walls, $50,000;

"For surfacing block pavements and paving the unpaved center strips of paved roadways, $25,000;

"For minor changes in roadway and sidewalks on plans to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to facilitate vehicular and pedestrian traffic, $5,000;

"For construction of curbs and gutters, or concrete shoulders in connection with all forms of macadam roadways and adjustment of roadways thereto, together with resurfacing and replacing of base of such roadways where necessary, $200,000;

"For the surfacing and resurfacing or replacement of asphalt, granite block, or concrete pavements with the same or other approved material, $450,000;

"For construction, maintenance, operation, and repair of bridges, including $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for replacement of the fender-pile system of the Highway Bridge, and including maintenance of non-passenger-carrying motor vehicles, $87,500;

"For current work of repairs to streets, avenues, roads, and alleys, including the reconditioning of existing gravel streets and roads, and including the purchase, exchange, maintenance, and operation of non-passenger-carrying motor vehicles used in this work, $750,000: Provided, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, should they deem such action to be to the advantage of the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized to purchase a municipal asphalt plant at a cost not to exceed $30,000;

"This appropriation shall be available for repairing pavements of street railways when necessary; the amounts thus expended shall be collected from such railroad companies as provided by section 5 of 'An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia', approved June 11, 1878, and shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation for the fiscal year in which they are collected;

"In all, not to exceed $1,741,350, to be immediately available; to be disbursed and accounted for as 'Gasoline tax, road and street improvements and repairs', and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided, That assessments in accordance with existing law shall be made for paving and repaving roadways where such roadways are paved or repaved with funds derived from the collection of the tax on motor-vehicle fuels and accretions by repayment of assessments."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to this part of the bill, as well as covering legislative provisions unauthorized by law. It provides for bridges out of the gasoline tax, and then it goes on and provides for matters in other sections of the bill. The gentleman did not give notice that he was going to strike out all after this particular section.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simply the language of the bill that passed the House last February. All I have done is to clip out the provisions of that bill and put them in here. The Appropriations Committee before did not offer any appropriation for streets where it was not in order because the clerk of the committee looked out for that. There was no question about its being in order at that time, and there is no question about it's being in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is germane to the bill, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOSS. Did I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that the amendment is germane to the bill or to this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. To this particular portion of the bill to which it is offered.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the amendments to which I referred, an amendment which goes back to the bill that this Congress passed in February for the same fiscal year, and it includes the figures and the streets and the projects that were recommended by the Budget committee and recommended to you by this same Appropriation Committee and passed by the House. Every dollar of the money provided for in this amendment is out of the gasoline-tax fund, a 2-cent tax on gasoline sold in the District of Columbia, that under the law can be used for no other purpose. The effect of the bill which has been presented to you today is that, if you do not spend this money on streets as is provided for in my amendment, you will be simply putting from three to four thousand people out of employment on street work in the District of Columbia this year, as shown in the hearings in the statement made by the auditor for the District of Columbia. While doing that a surplus of $1,800,000 of money of the District of Columbia, which can be used for no other purpose, will be permitted to lie idle in the Treasury. In addition to that, while you are doing that, you are in the same bill appropriating one million and a quarter dollars of the District's money for the purpose of feeding the unemployed in the District of Columbia. It is obvious that there can be no economical reason why this money in the Treasury should not be used for the purpose for which the tax was levied.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I was not able to follow all of the gentleman's amendment, but does it include a bridge over Rock Creek at Calvert Street?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I do not think this amendment does, but I have another one that will.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, any need for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] is amply provided for by a more comprehensive amendment which the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], proposed in the session of the Committee on Appropriations this morning and which the committee authorized him to offer at the close of this section as a committee amendment. I yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] to discuss, if he so desires, the proposition which he will propose when the appropriate paragraph is reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, the accumulation of surpluses in the gas tax fund and in the water fund has given the chairman of your committee and the chairman of the subcommittee considerable trouble. We got together and I presented to the main committee this morning an amendment on the gas tax fund and also one on the water fund and asked authority of that committee to present them to the House as committee amendments. The authority was unanimously given. If these Budget estimates sent to us pass the Congress, then in the gas tax fund there will be a surplus of $1,800,000, which is dedicated by the law that levies the gas tax only to the purpose of street improvements and repairs. It was a serious question for us to consider whether during the time of this great unemployment we should permit necessary improvements in the District to go unprovided and necessary appropriations that could be made for necessary improvements not to be made. Therefore, we concluded that we would offer a committee amendment to this bill making available $1,040,000, to come exclusively out of the fund raised by the gas tax, to be devoted to such projects as the President of the United States approved. The purpose was to permit him to pass on the circumstances and conditions that exist at the time and to consider the emergency said to exist at the time. Of course, in doing that he will have the assistance of his new Commissioners who will carry out his policy. Therefore, I ask you to vote down this amendment and vote for and adopt the committee amendment that makes more money available for the relief of unemployment and improvements that are necessary than does the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. I think that the amendment that the gentleman from Texas is going to offer is a better amendment than mine.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, not to exceed $1,237,400, to be immediately available; to be disbursed and accounted for as "Gasoline tax, road and street improvements and repairs", and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided, That assessments in accordance with existing law shall be made for paving and repaving roadways where such roadways are paved or repaved with funds derived from the collection of the tax on motor-vehicle fuels and accretions by repayment of assessments.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: Page 19, after line 11, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For additional street and road improvements and repairs to aid in the relief of unemployment, to be allotted for such projects and purposes and in such amounts as the President may approve (including the allocation of additional sums to any or all of the general items herein chargeable to the gasoline-tax fund), there is hereby appropriated out of the gasoline-tax fund and to be immediately available, such sums (not to exceed in the aggregate $1,040,000) as may be deemed surplus in such fund."

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill:

No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used for the operation of a testing laboratory of the highways department for making tests of materials in connection with any activity of the District government.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Page 21, line 4, after the word "government", insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For widening to 73 feet and repaving the roadway of Constitution Avenue NW., North Capitol Street to First Street, and for widening to 80 feet and repaving the roadway of Constitution Avenue NW., First Street to Second Street, and for widening to 80 feet and repaving the roadway of Constitution Avenue NW., Pennsylvania Avenue to Sixth Street, in accordance with plans therefor to be jointly approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, including the necessary reconstruction, relocation, changes, and adjustments of all water mains, sewers, and for storm-water sewer in Constitution Avenue, Sixth Street to Tenth Street (at a cost not to exceed $30,000), in advance of paving, trees, sidewalks, lampposts, fire hydrants, or other structures affected, and including personal services and all necessary incidental expenses, at a total cost not to exceed $138,000, of which sum $94,800 is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to be immediately available, and not to exceed $43,200 shall be transferred from and in accordance with the appropriation in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, for the construction of the Arlington Memorial Bridge."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the amendments which I mentioned before, attempting to restore to the bill needed public works in the District of Columbia which were provided for in the Budget report previously, which were provided for in the report of this Appropriations Committee in February, and which passed this House. The money for this will come out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, but in addition to that there is a portion of it that comes out of the Federal Government by reason of the allocation of another fund, because this particular project on Constitution Avenue is that wide new street that is being built from the Capitol over to the Memorial Bridge, and which passes by this great row of new Government buildings. If we do not do any work on that this year, that street will be left in a very unsatisfactory and unsightly condition, a condition which I am sure the Members of this Congress would not want to see. It simply does what 2 months ago this Congress and this Committee and the Budget Bureau said ought to be done.

I submit it for your consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. If the Committee were to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], it would mean an expenditure on this one project alone of $138,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. As a matter of fact, the amendment which I offered, and which was just adopted by the Committee, in the discretion of the President he can do this work, anyway, if he wants to.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. He can do it, anyway, if he wants to; but the salutary amendment of our chairman leaves it to the President in this time of stress.

Now, I want to show you what the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] involved in sums of money.

This is what it would have taken out of the Treasury: One item, $69,000; another one, $57,000; another one, $15,000; another one, $75,000; another one, $50,000; another one, $25,000; another one, $5,000; another one, $200,000; another one, $450,000. Think of it, $450,000 in one item! Another one, $87,500; another one, $30,000, making a total expenditure occasioned by the gentleman's last amendment of $1,063,500 that would have been taken out of the Treasury if we had allowed his amendment to pass.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield? Did the gentleman not report those very items and vote for them 2 months ago?

Mr. BLANTON. Others proposed to do it, but I did not. I want to tell you why the gentleman from Virginia thinks in such large sums. I do not blame him. What is $450,000 to him? He lives over in a great commonwealth district of our historical State of Virginia just across the Potomac River. He has watched this Government build the magnificent Memorial Bridge across to his district at an expense of $14,500,000.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I was not here.

Mr. BLANTON. But it goes to the gentleman's district. Then there was the Key Bridge costing nearly $3,000,000 more. The gentleman's predecessor, Mr. R. Walton Moore, our long-arm friend, helped to get these famous bridges built. Then there is a fine boulevard running from the Memorial Bridge, a boulevard nearly as wide as this Chamber, running all the way down to Alexandria, built by the Government. Then there are other big boulevards built over there.

There are 2,500 children of scholastic age from Virginia and Maryland going to the schools in Washington. They begin in the kindergarten here. They go through all the grade schools, they go through all the high schools, they attend the business high school. They are educated by the Government and the District government, at no expense whatever to the fathers and mothers living in Virginia and Maryland. Naturally, when the gentleman has grown up in that kind of atmosphere he can think in terms of these great big sums of tax money. I cannot think in such large figures, but it is easy for the gentleman from Virginia, if we will let him, to take all this money out of the Federal Treasury to spend, because he has so many constituents here in Washington, friends of his, who are interested.

I do not blame him. He ought to spend for them. He has to do something for them. Next to R. Walton Moore he is one of the most energetic men in behalf of his Virginia constituents who have ever served in this House. Just since he has come here his arms have grown 16 inches longer in the direction of the Federal Treasury. [Laughter.] He inherited that from Walton Moore. We must not pass this amendment. We must keep this bill in line. The gentleman has performed his service when he offered the amendment. He has gotten it in the RECORD. He has made a speech for it. He now must go along with us and help hold up the arms of the President.

His President is trying to get this country back to normalcy. He is trying to get the Budget balanced. He is trying to help the farming interests. He is trying to protect the bank depositors of the country. He is trying to bring the American people back to where they should be with a new deal granted them; and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

BRIDGES AND WHARVES

Benning Bridge over the Anacostia River: For completing the construction of a bridge to replace the bridge and trestle in line of Benning Road over the Anacostia River in accordance with the provisions and conditions contained in the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1933, $148,500.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: On page 21, line 11, after the sign and figures "$148,500", insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Calvert Street Bridge over Rock Creek: For construction of a bridge to replace the Calvert Street Bridge over Rock Creek, including necessary changes in water and sewer mains, and including the employment of engineering or other professional services, by contract or otherwise, without reference to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 5), or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and engineering and incidental expenses, $500,000, and the Commissioners are authorized to enter into contract or contracts for construction of said bridge at a cost not to exceed $750,000: Provided, That any street-railway company using said bridge shall install thereon at its own expense an approved underground system of street-car propulsion and at its own expense shall thereafter maintain such underground construction, and bear the cost of surfacing and resurfacing and maintaining in good condition the space between the railway tracks and 2 feet exterior thereto as provided by law, and shall defray the cost of excess construction occasioned by such use including the relocation and construction of closed plow pits at the west approach to the bridge in accordance with plans to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill and that it is a change of existing law. The Chair will note that the amendment sets aside several statutory acts. I think there may be a few acts it does not set aside.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Only to say that it is the language of the gentleman in the last District appropriation bill; it is the same language he reported in the bill in the last Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we are now cutting out all legislative matters on appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question but what the gentleman's amendment contains legislation and is subject to the point of order.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "bridges" in line 5.

Mr. Chairman, this matter of the Calvert Street Bridge is of little interest to me. Some 4 years ago the Engineer Commissioner had plans drawn for this bridge. These plans were submitted to and accepted by the Fine Arts Commission, and they provided for a stone bridge. The Commissioners seemed to forget they had that bridge plan; and within the last couple of years they had another bridge plan drawn providing for steel construction, and this cost them something like $60,000 in addition. This was in addition to the plans already drafted and approved by the Commissioners some few years ago. Had the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia been in order it was my intention to call to the attention of the House such tactics of the District Commissioners and especially the Engineer Commissioner. Such tactics should not be tolerated by this body. I do not know why they forgot they once had a bridge plan, but it seems a ridiculous waste of public money to have another one drawn. I understand we appropriated $40,000 last year to pay for part of these drawings and I understand there is an additional bill pending providing for $20,000 more. Am I right, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is correct.

Mr. GOSS. So now we have another bill for $60,000 for duplicate plans for this bridge.

I hope this will serve as notice to the Engineer Commissioner and to the other Commissioners of the District of Columbia that in the future we are going to watch these matters more closely than we have in the past.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For personal services of teachers and librarians in accordance with the act approved June 4, 1924 (43 Stat., pp. 367–375), including for teachers colleges assistant professors in salary class 11, and professors in salary class 12, $5,427,360: Provided, That as teacher vacancies occur during the fiscal year 1934 in grades 1 to 4, inclusive, of the elementary schools, such vacancies may be filled by the assignment of teachers now employed in kindergartens, and teachers employed in kindergartens are hereby made eligible to teach in the said grades.

For the instruction and supervision of children in the——

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: Page 27, line 23, strike out "$5,427,360" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,562,000."

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if it will be possible to secure the consent of the chairman and the members of the subcommittee for the restoration of this $135,000, when it is recalled that this is the amount carried in the bill that was before the last Congress, passed this body just a few weeks ago, and failed of enactment, and also that it provides for the continuation of existing educational facilities, the retention of the present scale of teachers' salaries and the present personnel. This is all that is involved, Mr. Chairman.

If this cut goes through and the bill, as reported, passes the House and, subsequently, the Senate, and becomes law, three things that concern me are going to happen.

In the first place, we are going to inflict upon the teachers of the District of Columbia a salary reduction, in many cases in excess of the 15 percent which the President of the United States has declared the maximum salary reduction that should be imposed upon anyone. No one here wishes that.

In the second place, it is going to result in the shortening of the statutory school year by at least 2 weeks, and perhaps 4 weeks. It is already short enough. That we know.

In the third place, it is going to result in the elimination not only of summer schools and night schools and of some of the kindergarten activities but of some of the vocational-guidance work. Further, this bill as drawn is also going to result in the curtailment of playground activities, and I am speaking of this in connection with the facilities afforded the children of the District of Columbia, as provided by accompanying items which are being slashed.

I think this is most important, and I certainly deplore the fact there are only 25 or 30 faithful Members in the House who remain here, late in the afternoon, to participate in this Committee discussion. I wish the matter could go over until tomorrow, so that we could resume debate upon this item at that time.

I realize this amendment may not prevail; I understand the pressure under which the Committee operates, and the necessary resistance to any amendment to increase the items as we reach them. I have profound sympathy for the chairman of the subcommittee, whom I have long admired.

But, Mr. Chairman, no one can tell me that the President of the United States favors making the little children, undernourished as they are, restricted in their educational and recreational facilities as they are here in the District, with families dependent on welfare and charity funds constantly increasing, pay for a depression that is entirely out of their control and for which they have no responsibility. I know too much about his philosophy, his principles, his convictions, his history.

I do not want to see the recreational facilities and the educational facilities cut down below what is sane and normal or what now is the minimum program here in the District.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does my friend believe that the facts are unknown to the chairman of the subcommittee and to the chairman of the main committee?

Mr. KVALE. Of course not, let me say to the diligent gentleman; but I insist that I am acting sincerely and on the basis of actual figures.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think that the subcommittee or the main committee of 35 Members of this House or the President himself would lower the standard or do injustice with respect to any of the things the gentleman complains about or thinks would take place?

Mr. KVALE. Apparently they have done just that, because I am citing facts here that are not denied.

Mr. BLANTON. Where does the gentleman get his facts?

Mr. KVALE. I get my facts from indisputable sources. I have been in conference with the members of the Parent-Teachers Association, with members of the teachers organization, and with members of the vocational-guidance group. None of them appeared before the committee or was consulted, and I only wish fervently that the committee might have paused just long enough to hear their facts and arguments. I think then that the committee itself would be sponsoring my amendment.

I have respect for the gentleman's opinion, as he well knows, but I do not admit that the Appropriations Committee or any member of it is infallible.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend that he knows the very high regard I have for him.

Mr. KVALE. I hope I shall continue to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. But I may say, with all due respect, I think this committee knows much more about these things than does the person who informed the gentleman.

Mr. KVALE. But the committee has not had the benefit of the facts that have been laid before me.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman ought to know that various members of this committee have been investigating these matters for years.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I shall yield to the chairman of the subcommittee, and I think he will verify my statement that these people were not consulted. On account of the stress of matters here, perhaps the committee has not had time to call upon them.

Mr. BLANTON. Not on the pending bill, but we have heard them year after year.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. From what I understand to be the facts in this case, there are about 40 teachers in the District that go from school to school and help in teaching activities in the District. Many persons believe these teachers unnecessary; others are of the opinion their work is very necessary. Anyway, the teaching force has been decreased in this bill by about 40 teachers. So, with the school population at a standstill, there would be no shortage in the teaching force, but I understand there is a substantial increase in the school population and also an increase in the number of classrooms.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. And that, perhaps, this cut may result in a too great reduction in the teaching force in the schools of the District, which should not be permitted.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman is correct. The teachers are already assigned too many pupils per unit, and they are already operating under a very heavy schedule. The classrooms are crowded, and this cut, if permitted by Congress, will not only result in what the gentleman describes but also in a lack of teaching personnel for schools that it is planned to open next fall.

I now yield to the chairman of the subcommittee in case he desires to take exception to any of the statements I have made.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. When the gentleman has concluded I shall take the floor.

Mr. KVALE. Then I shall conclude right now.

(Mr. KVALE yielded the floor.)

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, let me merely add here a thought or two which I failed to elaborate or from which I was diverted by the debate.

Let us realize what we are doing in this revamped bill, brought in to us with practically no hearings, and substantially below the carefully prepared bill which the committee reported and passed through this body in the last session after the most careful scrutiny and after consultation with competent advisers from the District government.

Departments and divisions of the educational system will go by the board; the school year will in all likelihood be materially shortened, teachers will suffer an unjustifiable and disproportionate reduction in salaries, summer schools and night schools as well as other activities will be curbed or eliminated, all in the name of economy. Bathing pools that have kept District children healthy and happy and removed during hot summer months from the streets for years and years will be closed.

Library facilities and recreational facilities, now in these days of unemployment and distress facing the greatest loads in their entire history, are to be sharply curtailed. In the name of God, when will we stop practicing this "economy" at the expense always of the defenseless and of those who are unable to raise their voice in organized protest?

No wonder the parents and teachers, organized in their associations, are aroused. No wonder the other kindred agencies are irate. No wonder that District taxpayers are asking why, voiceless in this body, they must stand helplessly by and watch our body cripple the agencies that they now depend upon more than ever before. No wonder that they petition us; to quote just a paragraph from one of them:

These abridgments and eliminations fall most heavily on the children who are in no way responsible for the present economic situation. If they lack good schools, libraries, and playgrounds, the alternative is ignorance and possible crime. The burden also falls on parents, whose ability to provide private schools, wholesome reading matter, and healthful recreation are now less than ever. In making the petition to have these essential services restored, we are not asking that the right to expend our own money through taxation be not denied us, since lacking in representation we have no other right except that of petition. As we understand it, there is happily not in the District of Columbia the lack of money needed to maintain these essential services. This favorable financial condition, due to the conservative, orderly development of educational and recreational facilities under the District Commissioners, we respectfully submit, should be made the occasion for a continued program of service consistent with the need for economic conservation at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, one word to stress the appeal in that last sentence. It should be stressed; it is a thought that the people of my own State have heard from me again and again in the last 3 years. This all goes deeper than a temporary and a transitory spasm of acute pain over the "economy" we effect just now. Uneducated and mentally handicapped youth, undernourished children, and those whose parents without means must with indescribable anguish deny the adequate medical attention and care as well as the proper rounded diets so necessary to growing children are piling up economic losses for the future which we cannot fully grasp. Try to compute the annual losses in earning power and national income that will result from these handicaps a generation hence. Try to envision the added social load this Nation, with its history and traditions, under its Constitution cannot dodge or evade, even if some of its leaders ever would. Try to realize the added sum of unhappiness and suffering for which we in our wretched ignorance will be responsible. Then let us approach these problems, as they come before us, in a different spirit.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Minnesota knows, I am in heartiest sympathy with the objective he seeks to attain. The weak points in my armor, when it becomes necessary to apply economy reductions to the items in connection with this bill, were always the schools and the libraries; but, Mr. Chairman, we should take into consideration the fact that there has been a phenomenal increase in all school facilities in the District in the last 10 years, with the result that the school appropriations are among the most generous in the bill and consequently ample to take at least their proportional cut. For example, with the last 10 years this appropriation has been more than doubled.

In 1923 we appropriated for this item $3,110,740, while for the current year of 1933 we are spending $6,539,764. That is an unprecedented increase for that brief time.

In fact, for schools, including sites and buildings, the increase since 1920 has increased at the astonishing rate of 261 percent—from $3,760,000 in 1920 to $13,600,000 in 1932. Certainly no one can charge that we have been neglectful of the schools or the cause of education in the District of Columbia. I dare say there has not been another city of the size in the country which has pyramided its expenditures for school purposes to this extent. In fact, Congress has been so generous in its appropriation for this item that for the last fiscal year, after expending every possible dollar required for this purpose, there remained on hand in this item a surplus of $103,640.89. If we gave them $103,000 more than they could spend last year, a little economy this year will do no harm.

As a further indication of the generosity with which the local schools have been provided for, the salary scale of the teachers employed in the District of Columbia is out of all proportion to those paid in adjacent States. For example, in Arlington County, just across the river, the average annual salary of public-school teachers is $1,093; in Fairfax County, $787; in Alexandria, $1,154; in Loudoun, $861; while in Washington the average annual salary of public-school teachers is $2,269.

Mr. BLANTON. And these teachers in the District of Columbia have not missed getting their salaries a single month.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is true, while in communities in every State of the Union, the public-school teachers, after being subjected to drastic reductions in salaries, are holding unpaid warrants which they cannot cash.

I understand that in the city of Chicago, for example, the teachers have not received their full salary for more than 2 years. Furthermore, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] has indicated, there is now a surplus corps of teachers in the District schools—a pool of approximately 40 unattached teachers, subject to assignment from day to day, which will supply every vacancy which might be occasioned by the reduction in this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KVALE) there were 15 ayes and 35 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KVALE: Page 28, line 4, after the word "grades", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no funds herein appropriated shall be so administered as to eliminate any department or division of classroom instruction or to shorten the statutory school year, or to effect a reduction in the annual pay of teachers and officers employed by the Board of Education in excess of the 15 percent maximum cut authorized in accordance with the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled, 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government.'"

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this proposed amendment is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill and a change of existing law and that it is therefore not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KVALE. No, Mr. Chairman; I regard that as a waste of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this amendment is subject to a point of order as being legislation, and therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

NIGHT SCHOOLS

For teachers and janitors of night schools, including teachers of industrial, commercial, and trade instruction, and teachers and janitors of night schools may also be teachers and janitors of day schools, $75,000.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CARTER of Wyoming: Page 29, line 4, after the word "may", strike out the word "also" and insert the word "not."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve that?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, the bill as it is written authorizes the employment of teachers both in day and night schools. With the great number of unemployed teachers in Washington I think it is fair that those who get a good salary for teaching in the daytime should not be authorized to get another salary for teaching at night. If they limit this to those who teach in the daytime, it will put to work several hundred unemployed teachers in the night school and allow them to get $50 or $60 a month. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SWANK. Will that take any more teachers if we adopt that amendment?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. No.

Mr. SWANK. Will it cost any more?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. It will cost no more. In other words, there will be the same number of teachers, except that those working in the daytime will not be allowed to work at night, and it will give a couple of hundred who have spent many years training themselves to teach who are now out of work an opportunity to earn something.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming desire to be heard?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. No.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, if it is a change in existing law it would be in order because this evidently would not be here unless it is a change in existing law. It is, therefore, not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is additional legislation on an appropriation bill and is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Then I make the point of order to the language in line 4, page 29, and all of line 5.

Mr. GOSS. I make the point of order that that point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is too late.

The Clerk read down to and including line 16, page 38.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committe do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4589), the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committe of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3342) entitled "An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BEER BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by taxation of beverages, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments:

On page 3, line 7, of the Senate engrossed amendments strike out "six" and insert "two."

On page 3, line 8, of the Senate engrossed amendment, beginning immediately following the colon, strike out through the word "business" in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That it shall be within the discretion of the Commissioners whether any permit under this act shall be issued for the sale of any such beverage in any building in the District of Columbia owned or leased by the United States and used for the transaction of public business"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

BEVERAGES INCLUDED

The House bill authorized beer, ale, porter, and similar brewed or fermented beverages containing one half of 1 percent or more of alcohol by volume and not more than 3.2 percent of alcohol by weight. The Senate amendment also included wines and fruit juices of like alcoholic content. The effect of the amendment was to authorize essentially the same kind of beverages as are authorized by the national beer bill. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

PERSONNEL FOR ENFORCEMENT OF ACT

The House bill authorized the Commissioners to employ clerical and other assistants to administer the act, the expenses, not to exceed $25,000, to be paid from the funds arising from license fees under this act. The Senate amendment omitted this provision. The conference agreement omits the House provision.

PERSONS TO WHOM PERMITS MAY BE ISSUED

The House bill provided for the issuance of permits to individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations. Under the Senate amendment no permit may be issued to an unincorporated association. The conference agreement retains the Senate limitation.

"ON SALE" PERMITS

Both the House bill and the amendment provided for the issuance of "on sale" permits to bona fide restaurants and hotels. The House bill provided also for permits to bona fide incorporated clubs with annual dues of at least $15. The Senate amendment reduced the required annual dues to $6. The conference agreement retains the Senate reduction in required dues.

In the case of restaurants, the House bill permitted "on sale" permittees to serve beverages at "tables." The Senate amendment required the sale to be at "public tables", but provided that no beverages should be sold in any room not used primarily for the serving and consumption of food. However, the Senate amendment authorized the Commissioners to permit the sale of beverages in private rooms or at private tables in the case of assemblages of more than six individuals. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision. The Senate amendment provided that no permit shall be issued for any restaurant which has not been established and doing business for at least 6 months immediately prior to the application for the permit. The House bill had no such requirement. The conference agreement reduces the 6 months' period to 2 months.

In the case of clubs, the House bill permitted the sale only at tables. The Senate amendment extended the privilege to the rooms of members or guests. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

"OFF SALE" PERMITS

The House bill authorized holders of "off sale" permits to sell beverages only "in original packages." The Senate amendment permitted sales in the immediate container in which the beverage was received by the permittee, except that in the case of an "off sale" permit held by a manufacturer or wholesaler the beverages may be sold only in such closed containers as the Commissioners may prescribe. The Senate amendment also prohibited sale by a holder of an "off sale" permit to other permittees for resale. The Senate amendment also forbade an "off sale" permit and an "on sale" permit to be in force at the same time with respect to the same premises. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

MANUFACTURERS' PERMITS

The House bill required a manufacturer's permit under which it is lawful to sell only to a person holding a permit. The Senate amendment limited the sale to sales in barrels, bottles, and other closed containers, and sale to the other permittee must be for resale only. Under the Senate amendment a manufacturer may get one "off sale" permit which is confined to his premises as a manufacturer, and sales under such "off sale" permit must be in such containers as the Commissioners may prescribe. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

WHOLESALERS' PERMITS

The House bill apparently did not provide for a wholesalers' permit. The Senate amendment requires a wholesaler to obtain a permit at a fee of $250 a year and he is permitted to sell to other permittees for resale only, and may sell only in barrels, bottles, or other closed containers. He may hold only one "off sale" permit, which shall be issued only for his premises as a wholesaler, and under such permit the beverages may be sold only in such closed containers as the Commissioners may prescribe. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SOLICITORS' PERMITS

The Senate amendment makes it unlawful for any individual to offer for sale or to solicit any order for the sale of, within the District of Columbia, any beverage unless he has obtained a solicitor's permit and unless the vendor is a holder of a permit issued under the act, but the prohibition does not apply to offers for sale or solicitations made upon the premises of the vendor. Solicitors' permits are issued for a fee of $1 per year and may be issued only on the recommendation of the vendor for whom the solicitor is acting. Nothing in the act is to be construed as repealing any portion of the District of Columbia License Act, as amended July 1, 1932. None of these provisions were in the House bill. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SALES IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The Senate amendment provides that no license shall be issued for the sale of beverages in any building owned or leased by the United States and used for transaction of public business. The House bill had no such limitation. The bill as agreed to in conference provides that it shall be within the discretion of the Commissioners whether any permit shall be issued for the sale of beverages in any such public buildings in the District of Columbia.

APPLICATION FOR AND ISSUANCE OF PERMITS

The Senate amendment rewrites these provisions of the House bill in the interest of a more orderly statement and easier administration. The House bill required the Commissioners before issuing any licenses to determine the total number of licenses to be issued, which number may be increased or diminished at any time. The Senate amendment omits this provision but inserts the requirement that not more than five "on sale" permits shall be issued to any one person. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

The Senate amendment also amplifies the provisions of the House bill in regard to the interrelation of the "on sale" or "off sale" permittee and the manufacturer or wholesaler. Under the Senate amendment before an "off sale" or "on sale" permit is issued the Commissioners must satisfy themselves that no manufacturer or wholesaler has any substantial financial interest, direct or indirect, in the business for which the permit is requested or in the premises for which the permit is to be issued, and that the business will not be conducted with any moneys, equipment, furniture, fixtures, or property rented from or loaned or given by any manufacturer or wholesaler. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

The House bill contained no provision for renewal of permits. The Senate amendment provides for a renewal of a permit on approval of the Commissioners without making a new application. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

DESIGNATION OF MANAGERS

The Senate amendment provides for the designation by a permittee of a person to manage his business for him, and for the designation of a new manager in the event of the termination of employment of any such manager. The House bill contained no such provision, except in the case of corporations, firms, or associations with more than one place of business. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

INTERRELATION OF MANUFACTURER OR WHOLESALER AND PERMITTEE

The House bill prohibited any manufacturer or wholesaler having any direct or indirect financial interest in the business of a permittee. Under the Senate amendment if any manufacturer or wholesaler has any substantial financial interest, direct or indirect, in the business of any "on sale" or "off sale" permittee, or in the premises on which such business is conducted, the permit may, in the discretion of the Commissioners, be revoked. The Senate amendment also provides that no manufacturer or wholesaler shall rent, lend, or give to any permittee, or to the owner of the premises on which he conducts his business, any money or property to assist in the conduct of the business. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

REPORTS OF SALES

The House bill required all permittees to submit a monthly report showing the quantity of beverages purchased during the preceding month. The Senate amendment omitted that provision and required a monthly report of sales to be made by "on sale" and "off sale" permittees. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

COLLECTION OF TAXES

The House bill provided that the tax imposed on the sale of beverages should be paid on or before the 15th day of each month. The Senate amendment fixed the 10th day of the month, the same day as that required for the making of reports of sales, as the day on which such taxes shall be paid. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

SALES BY OUTSIDE MANUFACTURER

The House bill prohibited any manufacturer of beverages outside the District of Columbia from bringing into the District and selling or offering for sale to permittees any beverage without first obtaining a permit from the Commissioners and agreeing to submit a monthly report under oath of the quantity of beverages shipped into the District. The Senate amendment prohibits any "on sale" or "off sale" permittee from purchasing any beverage from any manufacturer or wholesaler doing business outside the District of Columbia and not holding a permit issued under the act, and transporting or causing the same to be transported into the District for resale, unless such manufacturer or wholesaler has a certificate of approval from the Commissioners. Such certificate is to be granted only on condition that the manufacturer or wholesaler agrees to furnish to the assessor a monthly report under oath showing the quantity of the beverages sold or delivered to "on sale" and "off sale" permittees, and may be revoked by the Commissioners in case such report is not furnished. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

REVOCATION OF PERMITS

The House bill provided that in case of revocation of a permit upon conviction of the permittee for violation of the act, no license could ever be issued to such permittee, and no license could be issued in respect of the premises of such permittee for a period of 6 months. The Senate amendment provides that in case of such revocation the permittee cannot receive another permit for the period of 3 years. The House bill, in case of revocation of a permit by the Commissioners, provided that such revocation be for a period of 1 year. The Senate amendment places no limitation on renewal or reissuance in such case. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SALES TO MINORS

The House bill made it unlawful to sell any beverages at any licensed place to persons under 18 years of age. Under the Senate amendment, it is unlawful for an "off sale" permittee to give or sell or for an "on sale" permittee to give, sell, or serve any beverage to any person under 18 years of age. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

PENALTIES

The House bill provided for the maximum penalties of a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, and the Senate amendment fixes a maximum fine of $500 and the maximum imprisonment of 6 months, or both. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

The Senate amendment adds a "separability" clause protecting the validity of the remainder of the act in the event that any provision of it is held invalid. This provision is retained in the conference agreement.

EFFECTIVE DATE

The House bill provided that the act should take effect April 7, 1933. Under the Senate amendment, the bill will take effect immediately upon enactment, but sales or offer for sales will be unlawful prior to April 7, 1933. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

NAVY DIRIGIBLE "AKRON" DISASTER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I respectfully urge the committee to meet as soon as possible and report the resolution to the Senate.

The resolution (S.Res. 58) was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

Whereas the Navy dirigible Akron was wrecked at sea on April 4, 1933, while on a flight in the course of duty, such wreck apparently resulting in the death of 73 officers and members of the crew and the total destruction of such dirigible; and

Whereas it is imperative in the public interest that the responsibility for the wreck of said dirigible and the casualties resulting therefrom should be clearly ascertained, and that for this purpose a thorough, impartial, and unrestricted investigation thereof should be made by an agency having plenary authority to conduct such investigation; and

Whereas such wreck is one of a series of disasters involving the destruction of Army and Navy dirigibles with great loss of life; and

Whereas the dirigible is a costly form of aircraft and entails great expenditure in its proper housing and maintenance and requires an extensive staff of technicians and numerous personnel for its proper care and navigation; and

Whereas the utility of the dirigible for military or naval purposes is open to question; and

Whereas the Congress should become fully advised in the premises in order that proper and intelligent direction shall be given to the military and naval air policy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the cause or causes of the wreck of the naval dirigible Akron, and of the wrecks of other Army and Navy dirigibles, to seek to fix responsibility for the same, to inquire generally into the question of the utility of dirigibles in the Military and Naval Establishments, and to make recommendations to the Senate with respect to the use of dirigibles for military and naval purposes. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third and succeeding Congresses, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 20 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] to the pending bill, which I ask may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on yesterday I introduced an amendment exempting newspapers and periodicals from the operation of the bill. Since then I have conferred with those who have presented the bill, and I have put the amendment in different form, which I hope and believe is satisfactory to them.

I therefore ask permission to withdraw the amendment I offered yesterday and substitute the one which I have sent to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I desire to comment very briefly on the measure that is now before the Senate. I shall not detain the Senate long, but since I happened to be a member of the subcommittee and heard much of the evidence adduced before that committee I thought perhaps it might be well to make some comment on that evidence.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss at all the constitutional questions involved. The constitutional questions were gone into very thoroughly, I think, before the committee and in the debate on the floor thus far. Therefore I shall not attempt to discuss them except to say that so far as I am personally concerned I prefer to follow the reasoning of Mr. Justice Holmes, who wrote the minority opinion in the so-called "Child Labor case", and to advert to the fact also that in the antinarcotic cases later Mr. Justice McReynolds, speaking for the Court, intimated that a different decision might be rendered if the case came up properly for review again. Before leaving this phase of the matter, too, I should like to refer to the language of Mr. Justice Brandeis in the New State Ice Co. case, which I quote:

> There must be power in the States and the Nation to remold, through experimentation, our economic practices, and institutions to meet changing social and economic needs. I cannot believe that the framers of the fourteenth amendment, or the States which ratified it, intended to deprive us of the power to correct the evils of technological unemployment and excess productive capacity which have attended progress in the useful arts.

And then this significant sentence:

> If we would guide by the light of reason, we must let our minds be bold.

I think the bill is constitutional, though I recognize it may be a close question, and there is argument on both sides of the question and good reason for the positions taken by advocates on either side.

With that brief word, I pass on to what seem to me to be the broader aspects of this whole matter. The economic situation in the United States, and, indeed, in the world, is and has been for several years very bad; but, Mr. President, much as I dislike to say this, for I am motivated, I think, by the same impulses as are other Members of this body and would like to see times get better, and God knows the misery abroad in the land is shocking to all of us, I think conditions are constantly getting worse, and I think they will continue to grow worse so long as the policy of deflation continues. At some place or another we must turn around and go the other way. Thirteen million men are out of employment, and the number is constantly increasing. I noticed a statement in the press this morning, purporting to come from William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, to the effect that in March, the month just behind us, unemployment increased, and as unemployment increases purchasing power decreases; and as unemployment increases, therefore, just to that extent we are destroying the American market for the products of the soil, for agriculture, and for the various industries in the country.

More than 90 percent of all our production, mark you, is sold in the home market. The home market consists largely of the wage earners of the country. They spend nearly all they make for the commodities produced in this country. Those situated more fortunately economically, who have large earning capacity, may save much of their earnings, but the ordinary wage earner spends practically all of his. Therefore, he is the backbone of the great American market. Consequently, the more men who are unemployed, the larger the army of the unemployed, the smaller is the American market, more restricted is business and commerce in this country, and deflation goes on apace. If unemployment continues to go on the way it has recently, increasing at the rate of some four or five million annually, we shall face conditions in midsummer that will beggar all description. Consequently, I am anxious to do something about it. I believe the pending measure would have a very wholesome effect.

Evidence before the committee, from competent authority, those who ought to know, was to the effect that the enactment of the pending bill would place back to work six and one half million men. That means much; and if by passing merely one act Congress can perform such a constructive service as that, it seems to me the earlier and quicker we act the better.

Testimony of a reliable character was given to the committee that at the peak moment of 1929, when economic conditions were at their zenith, at the topmost point, right then, there were 2,000,000 men unemployed in America, that condition being due to technological improvements, mechanization of industry, and of the arts and the sciences. Reliable evidence was also adduced before the committee to the effect that if tomorrow, in some magic way, we could go back to normal times, to normal economic conditions, just as we were at the peak in 1929, more than 5,000,000 men would still be unemployed.

What is the answer to that? Almost with one accord those who appeared before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary stated that a shorter workweek was the answer. In fact, it was suggested by one of the witnesses, of national and international renown, that organized labor in the country proposed to see that there was a shorter workweek; that there must be a greater spread of labor in this country; that, if necessary, labor, pushed to its last ditch, with its back to the wall, would use its great weapon—economic force. It is a question of to starve or not to starve. The only way to take up the slack, to absorb the unemployment, he, with many others, stated, is to have a shorter workday and a shorter workweek.

It seems to me there are three things to which we might look forward: Either we must spread the work in this country, employ more men by enacting legislation such as that now before the Senate, which will enable us to add more than 6,000,000 to the number of employed at present and therefore improve our American market to that extent; or else, secondly, with the army of unemployed increasing, growing by leaps and bounds—the estimate being made by some that by the middle of June or the first of July it will be 20,000,000 if the deflationary policies we have been following so long shall be continued—then relief for the suffering and the needy must be provided on a scale the like of which we cannot even imagine at this moment. If we get to that point, it will take much of the country's wealth to extend the necessary relief. A desperate situation might easily be created and, in my judgment, is being created by this constant deflation, the constant destruction of purchasing power. I was informed—I do not know how true it may be—that the very day after we passed the so-called "Economy Act", which took 15 percent more pay away from the Government workers, and therefore decreased their purchasing power to that extent and went that much farther in the direction of destroying the American market for American products, one big concern in this city, where there are not so many large industries, notified all its employees that they would be subjected to another cut of 15 percent immediately because the Government had on the day before adopted that policy.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will pardon me, that is not to be held so much against the industry. The fact that the Government cuts the wages of its employees 15 percent merely starts the index to working, and industry cannot resist so easily as might appear. The Government is considerably more at fault than is industry itself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if it should become necessary to perform these services of relief on a vast scale, it would mean taxes such as we have never heard of before, because the people must be fed. And finally, third, if we do not spread the work by shorter hours and a shorter week, giving more people employment, and if we do not relieve the suffering, we come to one of two things—revolution or starvation; and in either case the destruction of our present economic system.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that of these three things that may happen, of these three courses that may be pursued, the one most salutary and wholesome, of course, for all the people is the passage of the pending 5-day week bill which will spread the work to such an extent that, as evidence before the committee indicated, more than six and one half million people will be employed at once.

How can shorter hours and a greater spread of work be obtained? First, they might be accomplished by the voluntary action of industry itself, of big business; but I submit, Mr. President, that, generally speaking, the trend in industry is just the other way. At this moment, when work should be spread as widely as possible, it has been the tendency, according to the evidence before the committee, for industry to lengthen the hours of employment, so as to force those who have been working 8 hours a day to work 10 hours and 12 hours at a much lower wage, thereby adding to the number of unemployed and also decreasing, to that further extent, purchasing power.

The second way to get shorter hours would be that which the representatives of organized labor have said it might be necessary for them to resort to, namely, economic pressure, economic force.

None of us want to see that come if it can be avoided; and may I say also that those who spoke for labor before the committee said they hoped it would never be necessary, but that they were prepared, if it came to a showdown, to insist on this spread of work, that general starvation might be avoided.

The third way to bring about shorter hours, a shorter workweek, is through the enactment of legislation by the Congress.

Those who appeared before the committee, almost without exception, I think, agreed that this bill would very generally have that effect.

Mr. President, the committee was informed that at the time the testimony was taken the high mark in unemployment had been reached for all time in this country, there being practically 11,000,000 men then out of work completely, and the evidence disclosed that probably an equal number were working part time, 1 or 2 or 3 days a week, and therefore having very little purchasing power. So that it was estimated then—and that has been 2 months ago—that there were more than 23,000,000 men in the country, a very large number of whom were supporting families, who were either completely out of employment or working part time.

It is true that if this measure became a permanent part of our body of law, we would have the 6-hour day and the 5-day week year in and year out. I see no objection to that. I do not care to place this legislation alone on emergency grounds. I think there is a very great emergency existing, but I am anxious to see the bill become the law of the land permanently. It will afford more leisure, that is true; but all the evidence before the committee was to the effect that leisure brings about the purchase of additional commodities, additional production.

Men and women, too, have time to pursue lines of activity in leisure that otherwise they never would be able to enjoy; and this brings about a demand for various articles of production that ordinarily never could be sold, for which there would not be any considerable market. It is good for the self-improvement of those who have a little leisure. In fact, all the evidence of President Hoover's Commission on Economics and Economic Trends, which was introduced before the committee, was to that effect. Leisure itself would be a good thing economically—that is the point I make—as well as affording an opportunity for education and self-improvement.

Mr. President, it would be an aid to agriculture. With 13,000,000 unemployed, of course, they are living on short rations, and all those dependent upon them are living on short rations; and with those employed only part time every possible saving is made on food. So that if we spread the work and subtract from the great army of unemployed some six and a half million people immediately and add them and their purchasing power to the American market, of course, it will be of inestimable benefit and aid to the American farmer.

Some people insist that the technological age has tended to increase employment. Of course, I think that statement does not bear analysis. As a matter of fact, as I mentioned before, at the very moment when we were enjoying the greatest so-called "prosperity" in this country—namely, back in 1929, before the break came in October—there were, even then, upward of 2,000,000 men out of employment, forced out of employment because of the mechanization of industry. I read from the evidence in the record of the statement by Mr. Lovell:

> The records of the Interstate Commerce Commission disclose that from the year 1919 to 1929, a 10-year period, during which the railroads of this country did the greatest volume of business, perhaps made the greatest earnings of any similar period in their history, 350,000 railroad employees were eliminated from the service.
> Three hundred and fifty thousand employees eliminated from the service in the midst of so-called "prosperity"— > not in a business depression, but when this country was booming in business. That reduction came about by bigger engines, more efficient engines, bigger cars, heavier bridges, heavier track, more efficient operation.
> There are 350,000 men eliminated while business was booming on the railroads.

Mr. President, many of those engaged in industry on a large scale are in favor of this legislation. The Full-Fashioned Hosiery Manufacturers of America, Inc., with something like 33 manufacturing plants, wrote a letter to the author of the bill, which was introduced in the record before the subcommittee, favoring this measure because of some of the facts I have tried to state; chiefly, that it would add to the purchasing power of the country, and therefore there would be more people to buy the products of the hosiery mills. So they were in favor of putting in the 5-day week themselves, and hoped everybody else would, because it would spread employment, increase purchasing power, and therefore they themselves could sell more of their own product.

But the most striking testimony, I think, that was given before the committee—at least it impressed me, I think, as being as striking as any testimony adduced—was that coming from the lips of Mr. Austin T. Levy.

Mr. Levy is a big industrialist. He said in his testimony:

> My name is Austin T. Levy. I live at Harrisville, R.I. I am president of the Stillwater Worsted Mills, which operate in 4 locations in the State of Rhode Island, 1 location in the State of Connecticut, and 3 locations in the State of Virginia. The company employs slightly in excess of 1,500 persons.

In answer to a question from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the author of the bill, Mr. Levy said:

> The outstanding capital stock of the company—

That is, his own company—

> is about $3,500,000.

He was asked then to give his view in connection with the bill, and I should like to read a portion of his testimony:

> If this bill resulted merely in a reduction of hours and a commensurate reduction in wages, I should oppose it. This bill is valuable only if the hours are reduced and the compensation either remains where it is or is increased. I think logically it will follow if we find complete employment for our people, that wages must be paid that have some relation to the cost of living.
> I think it is important also that the classes of employees not covered in this bill should eventually come under its roof. I think also that that will occur as a matter of public opinion and good practice. I think that will follow automatically in the wake of this bill. I have been inquiring, Senator NORRIS, as to the objections to the bill. The first that occurs is a problem, and the certain increase in cost in all products, and I have sought to translate that into definite figures as bearing on the particular industry in which I am engaged, namely, the wool textile industry.
> My company is engaged in taking raw wool as it comes from the sheep and transforming it into finished fabric, and distributing those finished fabrics to the people who make clothing from them. There are a number of ways of plant operation, and I shall give you the figures that have to do with the most unfavorable transition that would follow with this bill, and that is the change from a single operation of 48 hours per week to a single shift of 30 hours per week.
> The additional cost in a suit of clothes for a man would be, as I calculate it, $1.08, a trifling amount indeed, when all the other factors in this situation are considered.
>
> Where other transitions are taken into consideration, the additional cost is very much less.
> It is interesting to note that the decline in prices since 1929 has been so great, due to the facts and circumstances that have been operating, a change which this bill hopes to meet and correct, that after those increases in cost, due to the operation of this bill, we would still have to add 67 percent to the then increased cost in order to equal the existing prices in 1929.

Mr. President, I think the following evidence, which came from Mr. Levy, should also go into the RECORD. He said:

> Mr. Lovell testified this morning that when he entered the railroad business 12 hours a day was the standard day, and what is of more interest is not only the succession of shortening of hours but the automatic increase in pay that accompanied the reduction in hours each time it took place, and, what is very important and interesting to everybody, is that as they decreased the hours and increased the pay, the prosperity of this country went forward. If people ask what is the cost of doing what the Black bill would require, we might well ask what is the cost to the Nation in dollars—let alone the other costs—what is the cost to the Nation of the present unemployment, and if we take as a conservative estimate that there are 10,000,000 people unemployed—the American Federation of Labor says it is almost 12,000,000, and I think we can agree on 10,000,000—I have built up the following calculation. Ten million unemployed at a standard wage of $5 a day means $50,000,000; as many more working half time, or a loss of $2.50 a day, is $25,000,000. So we have a daily loss of wages on this one count of $75,000,000, which in a 5-day week becomes $375,000,000.

We have, going on at the same time, a huge national expense for the relief of unemployment, and if we set that down to the modest sum of $2.50 a week, 7-day week, it is only 30 cents a day, or a little more, and it becomes $25,000,000 a week. We have the huge total as the direct cost of unemployment of $400,000,000 weekly, or $20,000,000,000 per annum.

Now that, Senator NORRIS, is only the direct cost. We have the indirect losses that follow on that through the loss in security values, through the loss in real-estate values, through the losses in commodity values, through the losses in savings. Our savings banks' losses constituted four million of deposits last year and seven million bank accounts were closed. We assume that those people used up their last funds when those seven million closed their savings-bank accounts. We must add, then, the losses in dividends, and the losses in interest, and when you have added all those things together, while the figures are impossible, I believe, to obtain, I believe they represent a far greater sum even than the direct loss of $20,000,000,000 per annum.

When we point to those figures the whole foreign debt becomes relatively insignificant. The whole export trade of this country becomes relatively unimportant. Here we have a market at our doors of $20,000,000,000 per annum. Where else in the world could we find such a market? Where else in the world does it exist?

There have been a good many remedies suggested to meet this situation. Moratoriums on the payment of debts, expenditures for public works, many of them not needed, costly attempts to prevent the decline of commodity prices, equally costly attempts to open and maintain channels of credit, huge expenditures for relief, share the work, and then, most important of all, about 2 years ago just now, the edict went forth that there must be a liquidation of labor. As I understand the word "liquidation" it means "to terminate", "to wipe out", "to finish."

My opinion, Senator NORRIS, is that the depression did not begin in October 1929. It began when the order went forth that there must be a liquidation of labor. What occurred after October 1929 was merely a poker game on a grand scale indulged in by a small portion of our population. There was no connection between that unwarranted speculation and the real value of things which are built by human effort. The two things have no more relation than this table and the Potomac River, but when the order went forth, and the execution of the order began, that there must be a liquidation of labor, then the depression began, because then we proceeded to tear down our markets for the things that we made, and how we tore our markets down! We could no longer produce.

Mr. President, that is from no radical school of thought in this country. That statement was given in evidence before the subcommittee holding hearings on the pending bill by Mr. Austin Levy.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In just a moment. Mr. Levy is the president of the Stillwater Worsted Mills in Rhode Island and operates mills at 4 locations in Rhode Island, 1 in Connecticut, and 3 in Virginia, and employs in excess of 1,500 persons. The outstanding capital stock of his company is about three and a half million dollars. He favors this bill because he realizes we must do something to increase purchasing power, and to eliminate unemployment, and he thinks this will do the job.

Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator has mentioned exactly what I desired to ask him about, and if he is going to discuss it in the course of his address, I shall not ask him to stop now. But I am interested in knowing how the bill would increase purchasing power. What is the machinery that is to be set up under the bill that would insure a continuation of the same wages for shorter hours? What would there be to prevent a reduction of wages in the same proportion in which the hours of labor were reduced?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, of course none of us knows definitely what the result would be, but I can state to the Senator that the evidence before the committee all tended to show that results from such a measure as this would be extremely beneficial; that in all of the various movements of hours downward, when we went from the 12-hour day to the 10-hour day, for instance, the various objections which are used against the pending bill were used against that procedure. It was stated then that it would not increase purchasing power or contribute to the welfare of those whom it was meant to serve; but when we went from 12 hours to 10, wages not only held their own, they were increased, and there was a greater spread of labor. More people could be employed, hence the purchasing power was much greater.

Again, when the agitation was begun for an even shorter workday, to be reduced from 10 hours to 8 hours, the same old argument was trotted out and dusted off and used by those who opposed the shorter workday. They utilized the very argument that is being brought to bear today against the pending bill. They said it would not increase purchasing power, but would have an opposite tendency. There, again, is the experience. History shows, and the evidence before the committee showed—and if the Senator will read the report of the hearings before the committee he will see that the evidence all tended in that direction—that with the shorter workday more people were employed, wages were not reduced, but, on the contrary, were advanced, so there was greater purchasing power, and the American market continued not only to hold its own but to grow in importance. As the Senator well knows, in normal times we sell vastly more than 90 percent of our entire production to our own people.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the question has been very well answered, and evidence submitted in support of the answer. But if it is true that wages will not be reduced, and hours of labor will be shortened, then it follows as a matter of course that the general public will have to absorb the increase, does it not, to take care of the increased prices of commodities?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The general public is composed largely, may I remind the Senator, of the 13,000,000 now unemployed and those who are only partially employed. They will be glad to absorb their proportion of the increase in the cost which may come from the rise in the price of commodities, if they can get jobs. The witness to whom I have referred, Mr. Levy, states with reference to a suit of clothes:

> The additional cost in a suit of clothes for a man would be, as I calculate it, $1.08, a trifling amount, indeed, when all the other factors in this situation are considered.

It would cost the 13,000,000 who are unemployed, if they bought suits of clothes, an average increase of $1.08. But there will be 6½ million additional people employed who now are walking the streets looking for jobs, who would be glad to pay $1.08 more for a suit of clothes; and even then, the evidence showed, we would have to add 67 percent, if I remember rightly, to the cost of the suit of clothes to get back to the price in 1929.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The point about it is this: As long as there is a surplus of 13,000,000 unemployed men, they are not in position to demand any wages or any hours; but when we bring about a condition where production does not exceed consumption, then the laboring man will have a chance to barter for his wage, whereas today he has to accept whatever pittance he can get, because there are 13,000,000 men just as idle as he is.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The question raised by the Senator from Kentucky is not only interesting but one which vitally enters into the consideration of the bill. I should like to invite his attention, if he has not read it, as well as the attention of other Senators who may be interested, to an article which I had inserted in the RECORD, which appears in the RECORD of March 27, 1933, on page 873, giving the effect of reduced hours.

Mr. LOGAN. I should be glad to read the article.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I cannot let this opportunity pass in discussing this subject without suggesting to my colleague, the Senator from Indiana, that the theory—it seems to me a perfectly logical one—is that, instead of an increase in the price to the consumer, it will mean the reverse, even though the wages are increased, because the very necessity of this legislation comes about, as the Senator has so well said, from the improved machinery and the new inventions in all lines of human endeavor. The iron man, the machine, will be able to produce at a less cost than the man of flesh and blood; otherwise he would not be invented and would not be there. So that in the end the total cost of the product, when considered properly in comparison with the man who owns the machine and his income, the consumer ought to be able to get the product at a less price than he gets it for now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Precisely, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the author of the bill, stated in his comment before the committee to at least one witness, I remember, that up to date entirely too large a proportion of the price received for commodities has been going to capital and nowhere near enough to labor. With that statement I agree.

Mr. NORRIS. It has been going to the man who owned the machine.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes. So if a man gets a machine that can do the work of 60 men, he can dismiss 60 men and still have the equivalent of 60 men, and if he desires to do so can put all the earnings of the 60 men into his own pocket.

Mr. NORRIS. It would all be profit. He does not have any wages to pay to the iron man that is doing the work.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. He can use the iron man 24 hours a day, and in many cases does so.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. Is not one of the greatest troubles that nobody has yet been able to invent a machine that would consume as much as 60 men or buy as much as 60 men?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I shall not discuss extensively the evidence in the record of the hearings before the committee, but I wish briefly to refer to some portions of it indicating the enormous influence that a very few New York bankers have on industrial conditions in the United States.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to have the Senator discuss this point. The Senator is, of course, familiar with the fact that the courts have upheld the right of Congress to protect the people from a conspiracy on the part of monopolies throughout the Nation, even though a part of the business is intrastate. The Senator will also remember, and I hope he will comment on it, that there is evidence in the record of a conspiracy on the part of these very New York bankers to hold wages down and hours up, which, under the very cases sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States permitting Congress to legislate against conspiracy, would justify this bill. I am delighted that the Senator is going to discuss that question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am very glad to have the Senator's contribution to the discussion, and especially this phase of it. That evidence is in the record. I think some days ago, if I remember the figures—and the Senator will correct me if I err in any respect—the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] exhibited a chart here which indicated that the House of Morgan alone, through interlocking directorates, controls or exercises a certain measure of control, over 40 percent of the big business of the country. I do not desire to repeat what he has said much more ably than I could say it myself, but there are one or two features of these interlocking directorates that impressed me probably as having not been overlooked by the Senator from Nebraska but having a connection to which he probably did not refer at the time when he made his very interesting speech on this subject.

When one looks at the set-up and how practically one man in New York City can pull the strings and control the operation of manufacturers, transportation, banks, and mercantile concerns throughout the country, and then when one reflects on the evidence adduced before this committee of the conspiracy of the big bankers to manufacture and produce these commodities at the lowest possible cost in order to swell their profits, it indicates clearly, it seems to me, Mr. President, that labor has not a chance on earth ever to get a 6-hour day or 5-day week or to escape industrial slavery unless the Congress of the United States functions in their behalf.

I shall discuss only one of these banks, the House of Morgan. I am very glad, I may say, that the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency is going into some of the activities of this concern. I think it ought to have been done long ago before they had obtained their stranglehold on so much of the wealth of the Nation. But it is better late than never, and I hope the committee will go to the bottom of it and expose this machine in all of its ramifications.

I quote from the testimony of Mr. John P. Frey:

In taking up the firm of J. P. Morgan, I have omitted certain corporations in which the partners are concerned. The directory of directors in the city of New York names the following as the Morgan partners: Edward T. Stotesbury, Charles Steele, Thomas W. Lamont, Thomas S. Lamont, Horatio G. Lloyd, Thomas Cochran, Junea S. Morgan, Jr., George Whitney, R. C. Leffingwell, Arthur M. Anderson, William Ewing, Harold Stanley, Junius S. Morgan, Henry S. Morgan, H. P. Davison, Thomas Newall, Edward Hopkinson, Jr., Seamour Parker Gilbert, and Francis D. Bartow.

I did not mention J. P. Morgan, as he is, of course, one of the partners.

The CHAIRMAN. How many are there?

Mr. FREY. Nineteen, I believe.

Now, directly these 19 partners hold 18 directorships in other banks; 21 in miscellaneous corporations, most of them the largest of their kind in America; 12 in insurance companies; 32 in manufacturing corporations; 17 railway companies; and 19 public utilities.

The CHAIRMAN. What I would like to get is a list of the corporations. You have given the number of directorships these partners hold in these various corporations.

Mr. FREY. I have them here. Before that, Senator, I should like to indicate these commercial banks on which the Morgan partners sit, and the directorships which these banks hold in this great variety of corporations, because until that is done the picture does not become clear.

The Morgan partners hold directorships in the following:

Discount Corporation, of New York, which I have not broken down, because it would be a duplication.

First Security Co., of New York, which I have not broken down.

The Fidelity Philadelphia Trust Co., of Philadelphia.

Girard Trust Co., of Philadelphia.

Provident Loan Society, of New York.

But I desire to present this morning as the directorships held by the following 6 banks in which Morgan partners hold 1 or 2 directorships:

The Bank for Savings in the city of New York.

The Bankers Co.

The Bankers Trust Co.

The directors of these last two companies are identical.

The Corn Exchange Bank Trust Co.

The Guaranty Trust Co., of New York.

New York Trust Co.

Possibly these are called Morgan banks because Morgan partners sit on them, and apparently have much to do with their policy.

Taking these banks that I have just named, the six, I find that their directors hold 208 directorships in 104 other banks; 618 directorships in 569 miscellaneous corporations; 178 directorships in 142 insurance companies; 423 directorships in 360 manufacturing corporations; 283 directorships in 234 transportation companies. Those include railway, steamship, and aviation corporations, and 313 directorships in 266 public utilities.

Senator BLACK. Did you give us the total there?

Mr. FREY. Yes. The total is 2,023 of these directorships.

Mr. President, I think that all of us can easily agree that a financial machine such as I have just suggested, with the vast power it wields, is not for the good or the welfare of the American people, and that the sooner the light is thrown upon its various activities the better off the country will be.

I do not desire to add anything further, Mr. President.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. Before the Senator closed, I was hopeful that he would refer to the fact, as bearing upon the constitutional features that I mentioned a few moments ago, that Mr. John P. Frey, who has had long experience with labor, testified that he had always heretofore opposed any method of fixing work regulations by law, but that he had been compelled to reach an opposite conclusion, because the influence of the House of Morgan and of the other banks that he mentioned extended to every business activity in America; that it even included school books, school supplies, milk for the babies, every kind and quality of commodity, and that since these banks control the business activities the various presidents or managers of local companies have no power to fix wages; that, therefore, the laborer was helpless to negotiate with them, and that the conspiracy on their part to hold wages down and hours of labor up made it absolutely imperative for labor, if labor was to get any kind of a square deal, to secure it through the instrumentality of law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Precisely, and his conclusion finally was, if I remember the evidence—I have it here, but have not examined it recently as to the particular feature to which the Senator alludes—his final conclusion was that wages for about 40 percent of the industries of the country are finally determined by one man or one small group of men in Wall Street. In other words, that all the various general presidents, vice presidents, executives, and other officials of a vast number of concerns over the country really had no authority of their own to take any executive action without reference to the small group of leaders of the financial machine in New York and it was finally dictated there; that it amounted to a conspiracy which Mr. Frey thought ought to be exposed. He had tried to expose this conspiracy in various ways, but had had no opportunity to do so before, and was glad to give the information to the Senate committee examining this measure. That is about what it was, was it not?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I thank the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. They not only fix the wages of labor for the United States but the same people also fix the wages of capital in the form of interest rates on bonds and mortgages for the industries of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Of course, and the share that capital shall have from the consumer.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And also the price to the consumer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Precisely.

Mr. President, I desire to conclude. I am very much in favor of this measure; I believe it will represent the greatest step forward that thus far has been taken toward relieving the unemployment situation confronting us at the present time. I think it will tend to increase purchasing power tremendously, therefore restore the great American market, and, consequently, bring wealth, happiness, and contentment again to the American people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. WALCOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. WALCOTT. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I promised that I would request a roll call at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, and I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, before the Senator from Connecticut starts on his speech, will he permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]?

Mr. WALCOTT. I will.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In the Senator's time, since he is good enough to yield to me, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if it is true that the President has requested that the hours of labor per week be raised to 36 in this bill instead of 30.

A report has come to me to the effect that the President has called certain Members of the Senate to the White House and insisted on 36 hours instead of 30. I should like to know whether or not that is true, and I think the Senate ought to know.

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that so far as the President is concerned I have no authority to speak for him, and I would not do so under any circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is an amendment of that kind contemplated to the bill?

Mr. BLACK. No such amendment is contemplated by me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator know of anybody who expects to offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. BLACK. I do not. There was a reference made to it yesterday. I was informed a few moments ago by a Senator on the other side of the Chamber that the bill would be more acceptable to many Members of the Senate if it provided for 36 hours.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But what I should like to know is, would the Senator from Alabama be satisfied with 36 hours instead of 30?

Mr. BLACK. He would not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator know of anybody on his side of the Chamber who proposes to offer such an amendment?

Mr. BLACK. I do not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator know whether the leader on his side of the Chamber expects to offer such an amendment?

Mr. BLACK. I do not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, this problem of unemployment has been coming up at more or less regular intervals, and with increasing severity, for the last 50 or 60 years in this country, for the last century and more in Europe. In view of the seriousness of this problem, it seems to me of vital importance that we give the problem close study, not only as to its present application but in an effort to look ahead into the future to see if we cannot in some way or other devise methods to prevent its recurrence in anything like the volume in which it is occurring today.

I therefore started last summer with a young sociologist and had him study at close range the various conditions of unemployment; the causes, so far as possible, and the effects of this unemployment in various communities, including some of the western States, Kansas and Nebraska; living among the then striking farmers, on the benches in Pittsburgh, on the benches in the parks of New York City, picking up wherever he could direct information at first hand, getting the point of view of the unemployed and, in various localities, unemployment due to various reasons.

The report that has been made for me encompasses some 25 pages. It is too long to read; but a résumé of that report is, I think, very well worth while, and that is what I propose to give today. It has a direct bearing upon the bill that we are now considering. I will print the report in full at the end of my remarks. The report is the work of Richard S. Child, of Connecticut.

I do not want to be considered as favorable to this bill in all its details; but to the principle of fewer working hours per week, I am absolutely favorable. I believe that it is the only solution of this, perhaps our greatest national problem today.

Whatever has been the experience gained during the past 4 years, certainly one fact is outstanding: The Nation cannot risk stepping into the future with the threat of wholesale unemployment still hanging over its head. Immediate issues tend to obscure the problem. Two issues are immediate: First, the providing of adequate relief; second, the putting of men to work. But, granting these two be met, what then? The future still lies ominously ahead, rocking with every insecurity that has engulfed the Nation and the unprotected individual in the past.

The problem that must be faced now, while the public will is still sharpened to the task, is a comprehensive treatment of unemployment that will leave Nation as well as individual secured by at least those fundamental safeguards which are within the power of intelligent handling to offer from unlimited economic richness. No social fabric has the right to expect support from a people which it periodically either plunges into swift and terrible want or presses slowly into fantastic poverty with the imposition of a miserable standard of half living. Unemployment today is not a sign of individual but of collective incompetency.

The problem is far more than immediately to put men to work, whether it be through the adoption of a 30- or 36-hour week or the spending of public funds. The Nation must look into its future as well. The Nation can and must be assured of relief from the burden of charity; the normal and healthy individual must be guarded from the humiliation of facing charity; charity organizations must be for all time relieved of work not within their proper field. And while this means primarily that men must be placed at work, it means also that men must have the assurance of work in the future; more than that, the assurance of an income that will not only grant them and their families a guaranty of at least the essentials of twentieth century American life, but a guaranty that they will not, if temporarily out of a job, drag other workers with them into unemployment because of a consequent loss of purchasing power.

On the safeguarding of these fundamentals depends the future health of the Nation. Once the envy of all European workers, our wage earners must today look to England, to Germany, and to lesser countries, where the misery of unemployment can at least be borne without loss of self-dignity, without the humiliation and suffering of rationed and uncertain charity doles, without the loss of home, without the fear of starvation, with an assured if still inadequate income, and with the assurance that a well-organized system of employment exchanges will bring instant notice of any jobs suited to their peculiar skills.

As a result of the severe financial crisis in 1921, when the unemployed mounted in this country to upward of 4,000,000, a conference was called by the President to discuss the situation, to recommend remedial measures, that America might not again be haunted by the tramp of aimlessly wandering feet. At that time it was written:

> When business again declines men will be laid off and the problem of unemployment may again become serious. It will then be too late for any measures except relief for the unemployed unless we now address ourselves to the task of preventing or at least reducing these extreme fluctuations of business activity. Prevention, as contrasted with relief, is possible only through foresight.

Numbered among the definite recommendations were: The building up of adequate wage reserves to provide insurance against future periods of unemployment; a Nation-wide and interconnected system of employment bureaus forming a labor exchange which might not only furnish information on employment fluctuations continuously and accurately but which might also bring men and jobs together with an efficiency equal to that which brings commodities to buyers on our commercial exchanges; and, coupled with the last, an emphasis on the need for the further collection of fundamental data and a broader, more coherently centralized statistical service. In addition, there were numerous pious suggestions that private enterprise guard against the perils of overexpansion, save building projects for depressed periods, and the like.

Voluntary action was the instrument looked to to accomplish these reforms:

> Prevention, as contrasted with relief, is possible only through foresight.

Now, some 12 years later, it might be added:

> Accomplishment, as contrasted with discussion, is possible only through action.

What happened?

A succeeding period of prosperity rapidly shook the specter of economic insecurity from the minds of our largest, most thriving industrialists. No one of the reforms so earnestly suggested in 1921 took shape in any effective form. A few outstanding firms did attempt to regularize their employment and production schedules; some set up unemployment reserves; but no general need was felt to give coherence or the authority of centralization to these scattered efforts. Two thirds of 1 percent of our 31,000,000 wage and salaried workers came to be covered by any form of unemployment insurance, whether under individual company, trade-union, or joint-agreement plans. No system of public employment bureaus acting as a Nation-wide exchange was set up, and the remnants of our war-time system fell into decay. There exists today no adequate machinery for ascertaining the extent and degree of unemployment, and the figures given out under the last administration were continually and rightly under suspicion.

Extenuating circumstances may partially justify our neglect of fundamentals during the brief new-era period. Certainly many an individual tragedy of involuntary unemployment during those years was obscured by the unprecedented optimism which swept over employer and employee alike. Certainly the latter aspired to a standard of living that, though guaranteed by no provisions against old age, sickness, or unemployment, was still the envy of other workers the world over. But the extent of the catastrophe today only emphasizes the inadequacy of individual company efforts toward stability, the inadequacy of high wage rates alone to tide the individual worker over even short periods of worklessness. No one man, employer or employee, can stand out against an intensely interdependent industrial environment. It is that environment itself, the Nation, that must give, that can give, an assurance of at least those rock-bottom essentials to healthy living that can alone bring a sense of security to its individual components.

One looks on America today. Actually, there exists nothing to suggest that it had ever before tasted the self-destructive insanity of Nation-wide, all-inclusive unemployment, of terrifying want in the midst of spilling plenty. There is no sign that many a fine word has blown across the face of the land. Emergency relief is still today, after 4 years of emergency, the pressing and unsolved problem, progressive only in its growing futility and intensity.

No social assurance exists that this collective insanity will not reoccur. Voluntary action is not to be depended upon. Action must come from above. It must be direct, all-inclusive, and mandatory. Competition, when it means cutting under the standards of living of which we were once proud by starvation and the exploitation of human misery, is not a principle to be rigidly adhered to.

If we are to profit at all by this present experience, we must crystallize into definite form the lessons taught by the last 12 years. Words, promises, discussions are not enough. There is a real danger lest business upturn again blind us to the weak spots in our economic system. We must act now during this period of acute self-consciousness. To reform a banking system, to launch loans intended to place men at work, to curtail the hours of labor, to restore agricultural purchasing power—none of these is enough by itself. None affords provision for future security. Now is the time to make lasting those elementary and essential safeguards which more pressing economic circumstances have urged most European nations to adopt in some form, and which in practice have proved not only humane, economically sound, but, in this world of industrial interdependence and intense local specialization, essential for the preservation of that which we prize above all else in our civilization—the integrity of individual self-hood.

Since the past 12 years have served only to emphasize the lessons in elementary economics, little can be looked for in the line of prevention as opposed to relief during the last 4.

May I interpolate here that in this larger report is to be found the quite complete history of the last 4 years; but, inasmuch as it would consume considerable time to give it to you, I refrain from that, and hope that perhaps it may be inserted in the RECORD at some other point.

Yet the last 4 years have expounded eloquent lessons in emergency relief methods, and it is necessary rapidly to sum up this newly acquired sober knowledge.

We have learned that local relief ideals, stemming from the inception of Elizabethan Poor Laws, and first shown inadequate with the dawn of industrialism, have not increased their claims to validity with the increasing interdependence of an industrialized and therefore locally specialized nation; that municipal, county, and State border lines are fictitious map conceptions in a land where Pennsylvania coal drives engines in California as well as in Maine, where Kansas wheat fills bellies in New York and San Francisco, where North Carolina cigarettes are smoked the Nation over and Detroit automobiles are familiar with every highway; where industrial and commercial promoters, boards of directors, armies of individual stockholders, modern absentee landlords, are scattered far from the sources of their wealth; where the corporate system differs from the feudal in that its units are linked by slips of paper and not by geographic area. Yet we have, with high slogan chanting, fled indignantly from phrases such as "Government interference" and "dole" when it came to feeding the Nation's hungry, and have insisted that pauper care for pauper, taxed with local taxes property that earns its ability to pay from local sources, ignored the concentrated pools of intangible wealth gathered from the Nation in corporate profit, and so sought to destroy all wealth by sucking dry its very foundation, low-income consumer's capacity to buy.

We have learned the costliness of economy that insists on the utter pauperization of whole families and countless individuals before they can be considered applicants qualified to receive a haphazard and miserably inadequate dole—that demands that before relief can be given, every salable piece of property, house, furniture, and clothing, the thin savings of a lifetime of struggle, the painfully gathered symbols of social respectability and personal achievement must already have been slowly consumed, bit by bit, in bits of food. Yet we have learned this at the expense of reducing 3,000,000 families to utter dependence on humiliating charity doles; at the expense of seeing 50,000 families more, equally destitute, increasing their numbers daily, denied even charity for lack of funds; at the economic expense of removing more than one third the Nation's population from effective consuming power; at the expense of destroying in innumerable cases not only the mental will to go on trying but the physical ability to do so; at the expense of breeding unemployables, malnutritional diseases, and deformed children to darken the future; and at the expense of wiping out local educational, hospital, and legitimate charity funds.

I may add here that in the full report, of which this is merely a brief summary, the points which are made here are all elaborated and definite proof given of every statement.

We have learned—or should have learned—that just as all efforts toward the prevention of unemployment must inevitably have been brought to nothing by the means relied upon to realize that end—chaotic voluntary action—so, too, relief measures, relying upon the same tactics, however well intentioned, aimed at nothing beyond stabilizing stagnation, must crumble. Voluntary action on the part of individuals, actual or legal, competing for profit in a world of intense interdependence, must result, where one man, in order to maintain an ever-increasingly precarious economic position, is forced to climb to the level of a more ruthless competitor immediately below him, in the gradual descent of the Nation as a whole toward the level of its lowest dirt. Caught in the fascination of its own nightmare, the Nation has been unwilling to set limits beyond which wholesale pauperization shall not reach and helplessly has watched the boasted standard of American living shrink to a bare subsistence ration amounting hardly to $200 a year; spellbound, has seen its vaunted business leaders, its manufacturers and financiers, surge downward in dizzy jig, a sweatshop driver piping the tunes of social and industrial chaos.

That seems like an extreme statement, but I am convinced, from the foregoing report, which gives specific illustrations, that that paragraph is in no sense an exaggeration of the position in which we find ourselves today with reference to unemployment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, unfortunately I did not catch what report the Senator referred to.

Mr. WALCOTT. A report I had made for myself by a young sociologist, who started to work on it last August. I explained this at the beginning of my remarks.

To continue, the Nation collectively, expressing its will through government, is alone free to act. Engrossed in admiring the triumphant achievements of this so-called "individual" or that, as he rides borne high on a million shoulders, we have chosen not to search too carefully our collective achievements.

I want to emphasize here the great difference that exists between individualism and collectivism.

Individually we have grown skilled in the raising of fruitful crops, in the rich gathering of vitamin and energy from sun and soil; collectively we dump them when they are oranges into Pacific waves, milk along Wisconsin highways, corn into Iowa stoves, or lock them indiscriminately behind glass windows hungrily to be gazed upon.

Individually we have become skilled in the securing of abundant natural resources from the ground; we have shown great inventive power and have constructed machinery capable of unleashing the stored forces of long-vanished suns; collectively we shiver for lack of coal, walk ragged because we have no clothes, no shoes, and condemn as an orgy of luxuriously wild spending a time when once we aspired to the using of what we had created to be used.

Individually we have set up many magnificent buildings, many decently livable houses, and have advanced far in the science of hygienic living; collectively we sleep in kennels built of refuse, shrink for shelter like cats in doorways, grow white and sickly in the darkness and dank filth of slums.

Individually we have made marked progress in our knowledge of bodily requirements for physical and mental health, of the causes, cures, and prevention of many diseases; collectively we press one half our population into the weakness and mental apathy of semistarvation, study food rations that to the fraction of a penny will keep adult bodies only from too speedy a deterioration and no more, set about destroying the bodies of a generation to come, and breed with increasing rapidity every form of terrible malnutritional disease formerly associated only with the destructiveness of war, flood, earthquake, or natural famine.

This is all true today in certain sections of this country and among certain people, particularly in the larger cities.

Individually we have set up high standards for labor—clean factories; high wages; short hours; regular employment; old age, sickness, and unemployment insurance funds; collectively, wielding the club of mass starvation for bargaining power, we use labor to the point of physical exhaustion, slash wages to a cruel subsistence level, call the chaotic protestations of gnawing bellies and outraged dignity "radicalism", and in the name of liberty and the revolutionary tradition of our fathers attack it with machine guns, night-sticks, and gas bombs.

All of those are individual incidents of this terrible burden of unemployment which rests on this country today; not frequent, of course, but here and there, and all shown clearly and referred to as facts in the report that has been made.

Individually we sing praises to the nobility of work, to the rights of citizenship, to the sanctity of private property, to the beauties of family life, exalt the dignity of individual man; collectively we deny opportunity to work, deprive millions of their right to share in a national welfare to which they had contributed, steal away property, smash up families, and mock individual dignity with the haunting humiliation of charity rations.

All forced upon us, of course, as the result of this unemployment we are now facing.

Individually we make much of economy and thrift; collectively we indulge in an orgy of waste beyond the limits of imagination. We first spend billions of dollars in the erection of magnificent machinery, buildings, and transportation equipment; next we take millions of dollars from consuming capacity so that what we had built cannot effectively be used, and proceed to build still more; finally, when nothing is being used, we squeeze millions of dollars into niggardly charity relief—just enought to insure that nothing that was so expansively built can be used. After an intoxicating jab of economy our drunken collective wisdom squanders away daily untold millions of dollars, rolling into billions with the years, needlessly to pay for idle machinery, empty buildings, wasted human energy, and the darkness of a terrible future.

Individually we have not hesitated to attack and to subdue the laws laid down by nature, to adapt them to our practical needs; collectively we stand helpless before laws insisted upon by the mental sluggishness of some few men, while our efforts to readapt them to practical need are phonographically called "impractical", "emotional", "unsound."

So, in the year of our Lord 1933, in the year of our progress 157, individually we stand—collectively we reel.

However desperately urgent the problem of relief may still be, the essential question is to relieve relief. Relief itself is cracking down. At best it had no aim beyond the alleviation of present distress.

Prevention of unemployment must be conceived of as the providing of security against the consequences, social, economic, as well as individual, of unemployment. Unemployment in itself cannot be prevented. The consequences of unemployment can be prevented. The problem is not to prevent unemployment; it is to reabsorb the unemployed. It would be just as fantastic to insist that men no longer needed remain in industry as it would be to insist on the continued use of obsolescent machinery. The problem is not to regularize the production of each factory; it is to rechannel and keep fluid the stagnant masses of the intermittently employed, thus forcing a maximum of regularization on factories while a maximum of efficiency in a distribution of labor energy is being exercised.

We live in a profit economy. Factories are lured into action only when claims to wealth are in the hands of purchasers. Active factories turn claims to wealth as well as goods over to purchasers. Men can only be fully employed as long as claims to wealth remain in their hands. The activity, wealth, and health of the Nation is thus in a sense self-generated; so, too, is the stagnation, poverty, and sickness of the Nation. The burden of charity but increases stagnation, industrial as well as human. Charity must be limited to its proper field.

Provisions for the maintaining of adequate purchasing power are the keys to the prevention of the social, economic, and individual consequences of unemployment. This calls for collective action expressed through legislation passed and enforced by central government. Unless so expressed as the collective will, the achievements of individuals cannot be preserved. Constitutions and laws are but the expressions of individual achievements and aspirations in terms of the collective will. No steps have as yet been taken to preserve standards aspired to by American industry. Voluntary action is today bound hand and foot. Even if it meant well, it could not be looked to for effective action today.

National and individual security is the goal. Steps toward that goal must be determined both in the light of immediate necessity and eventual efficacy.

The first move to be taken is the mandatory establishment of the 30- or 36-hour week in industry. Its effect will be most immediate. It requires no setting up of elaborate machinery to control it. It enjoys the hearty backing of organized labor, farmer organizations, and far-sighted manufacturers the country over. It automatically releases purchasing power without the launching of Government bonds and delay of increased taxation. It automatically provides men with vital work without the delay involved in launching a public-works program. It is an important step toward regularization of employment. Most important of all at the moment, it will put an end to the gradual self-destructive sag now reducing industries to bankruptcy the country over; the insane chaos bred in the competitive struggle to snatch the hand-to-mouth orders of hesitant jobbers and retailers, resulting in longer and longer hours of driven labor for fewer and fewer men at lower and lower wages. With a falling price level and a steadily decreasing demand for goods no manufacturer dares manufacture to stock. The effect of increased employment and a new release of purchasing power will be twofold: It will mean the employment of more men still to meet the new effective demand, a rebolstering of the price level in response to new orders. These in turn mean a loosening of stagnant credit as well as the opportunity for industry to restabilize itself with a return to manufacturing to stock. There is at present a great shortage of commodities in the country. Though imperfect in its rigidity, the 36-hour week is an entering wedge toward the establishment of the concept essential for the maintenance of a steady flow of purchasing power—hours of labor, not men, must in general fluctuate in accordance with new technique, with temporary slackening of demand. No rise in the price level, so badly needed at the moment, the objective of all inflationary measures, can be sound save as it grows upon the solid foundations of an expanding purchasing power.

The second move, and it is placed second only because it cannot as immediately be launched, is the projection of an intelligently planned public-works campaign. National credit must be mobilized to perform what private credit at the moment cannot—it must be mobilized toward joining together our vast natural, industrial, and human resources in the re-creating of national wealth. A multitude of projects, all of them socially necessary, lie in readiness in every State in the Union. Many of them, having been held up during the depression, have thus played their part in deepening the depression. No prosperity has ever visited this country when building was not involved—whether it was the private building of railways or automobiles or the Government building of war-time munitions and supplies. Now mockingly in self-defeat we pray for war, yet it is within our instant grasp to re-create war-time conditions. Our Liberty and Victory Loans need only be directed toward social reconstruction rather than destruction of enemies. Building projects should, too, as in war, be non-self-liquidating. The object is not further to burden the consumer but to enable him to drain off the present supply of our productive capacity. Loans as in the case of war loans, will be repaid during the period of returned prosperity in industrial activity.

There is talk of the need for a redistribution of wealth. There has never been a period of prosperity without redistribution of wealth. Each investment in new productive enterprise, insofar as it is paid out in wages, transportation, and materials, is in effect a redistribution of wealth. We fall down only when these new enterprises in turn become productive and wealth has not been correspondingly redistributed to pay for the increase in goods produced. Therefore, it is now essential for the Government to act as redistributing agency in the construction of social goods that do not have to be paid for by consumers—non-self-liquidating projects—in order that private redistributing agencies, the Nation's business world, may continue profitably to find outlet in their customary industrial, commercial, and agricultural self-liquidating projects.

It is estimated by experts that 80 percent of money expended in public works, covering such socially needed projects as slum destruction, construction of highways, parks, and bridges, flood control and reforestation, goes into labor, either directly to those locally employed or to those engaged in fabrication and transportation of materials. Sectional interests are actually not affected: 75 percent of the money spent on the new San Francisco bridge went to labor east of the Mississippi.

A public-works campaign will attack directly the largest pools of stagnant labor. Unemployment is heaviest in the production of raw materials, manufacture of capital equipment, and the building trades. Its ramifications extend to farmers and railroad employees. In no other way can private credit so effectively be unfrozen. While charity expenditures are only a burden, large expenditures on public works are essential primers of the industrial pump.

So much for the immediate putting of men to work.

The next move is the most fundamental of all contemplated attacks on unemployment. It is the prerequisite to any adequate and mature handling of the problem. It is immediately needed to bring knowledge to our present handling of the situation as well to lend intelligence to steps of the future. An interlocking Nation-wide chain of public employment agencies as provided for under the Wagner bill must be set up. It will automatically supply authoritative information from all corners of the country. It will be invaluable as clearing houses for local labor supplies. It will play an essential part in the vast work of redistributing and reeducating labor as yet to come. It affords the only practical means through which the right man will come to the right job. It is a service to both employer and employee. It is the only logical answer to the constant fluctuation of labor that comes as a consequence of dynamic change in industrial and business method. Its absence to date has been a missing cog in our economic system, and has allowed the placement of jobless men to fall into the cunning profit-grubbing hands of the private agencies.

The full report is the most shocking thing I have ever read on this particular subject. The grafting of employment agencies in our large cities is unbelievable until it has been investigated at first hand.

While primarily of impersonal economic importance, its social value is equally great. As recent experiments have demonstrated, the fact that a man out of a job can carry his problem to persons trained in handling it, able to discuss it intelligently with him, eager to secure him a new position—the fact that that man is not ignored, that he is given to feel that society is still eager to receive his contribution—is of immeasurable importance in preserving that man's sense of dignity and morale. In no other way can industrial society demonstrate that the individual, his skill and personal ability, is worth preserving. It is the only possible answer to long, discouraging, energy-sapping, savings-draining, haphazard months of hopeless job-hunting. A nation of scarecrow transients cannot long afford to be without such service.

The three experimentary public employment services at present being carried on in Philadelphia, Rochester, and Minneapolis demonstrate what skilled efficiency may be expected to accomplish in this line. Their experience furthermore cries out for the immediate extension of this service to all corners of the Nation. That it must be under nonpolitical administration is a foregone conclusion. Political hacks have done enough to damn such efforts in the past. In the future it can also be expected to play an essential part in the local adjustment of hours of labor to existent demand, in the recruiting and reeducating of fit men to increasingly important service positions. The industrial future of the Nation is linked with its establishment. And last but not least it is a prerequisite to the setting up of the fourth step toward protection against the consequences of unemployment:

Unemployment insurance. This, too, must be Nation-wide and mandatory. Individual efforts have only demonstrated their incapacity for action. Nor is it entirely fair to look to private enterprise for this safeguarding of the Nation's essential purchasing power. In a land where industry is dependent upon industry individual unemployment-insurance schemes would inevitably break down just as have local relief efforts. Only by industry as a whole can the slight burden fairly be borne. Depression does not rest with equal weight on all industries. Unemployment insurance is as essential a step toward security from the economic as from the individual point of view. Only through such insurance can the Nation be assured of a constant cushion of buying power for its essential consumer's goods; only so can the farmer and the local community retail store be saved from the vagaries of chaotic industry, can landlords, and so property values, be preserved against the disaster of unchecked deflation and its ramifications. Only through unemployment-insurance benefits can the individual know security or an approach toward security in his own life; can he dare lay plans for the future; can he feel that to do efficient work is not to cut his own economic throat; can he receive even a slight share of the wealth he aided in creating; can he and his family, his children, be guaranteed at least the right to healthy food and adequate clothing; and, most important of all in a land where human dignity is still talked of as an asset, can the individual preserve his own sense of independence and be relieved of the humiliating threat of charity, be preserved from its haunting psychological effects. Daily bodily needs do not fluctuate in strict accordance with the peaks and valleys of industrial production. Charity must be freed from paying industry's wages.

But employment agencies must first be established. The Nation must be assured that its insured jobless are pressing jobward. Local bureaus will be at once the logical centers of benefit distribution as well as in position to provide an automatic check on the applicant's sincerity in his demand for work. The acceptance or nonacceptance, within reasonable limits, of a job offered will determine whether or not one may qualify for the payment of benefits. Linked so with employment bureaus, all stock arguments against the payment of unemployment insurance are smashed.

America has lagged behind the rest of the world in its collective efficiency. Environmental circumstances have played a large part in postponing the day when she must face herself as a mature and interdependent social unit. She must now act to preserve what her individuals have accomplished. Competition is insane when it can only destroy what has laboriously been constructed. European initiative has demonstrated over a period of years the several pitfalls and advantages in the methods of administering social insurance. American inventiveness and boasted native efficiency will find no difficulties in perfecting much of this experimentary machinery. The essential necessity of such machinery is no longer in doubt.

But it is no longer a question of discussion. Action alone can now be effective. And now, while the stage is set, the moment for action has arrived.

The report referred to is here printed in full as follows:

INTRODUCTION

There is nothing either socially devastating or personally degrading in the mere fact of unemployment. More and more and more unemployment is actually the goal, the end of industrialism. It is because continued employment is made the sole means through which a man may qualify himself to the right to live, to keep a home, to nourish and to educate his children, that any break in employment is both socially devastating and personally degrading.

Continuous employment is, however, impossible. The roots of unemployment lie deep in our industrial civilization. They are intimately linked with the soil of capitalism. It is the consequence of unemployment, social as well as personal, that can be easily and effectively provided for.

A myriad of causes may shut down a factory. But while it is idle it remains intact. Homes built about it, however, are ruthlessly destroyed; property values vanish; personal belonging are lost; food is snatched from hungry mouths; families are broken up; lives are made chaotic; human values are hastily thrust below those realized by spinning wheels. Fire is less destructive than this. To keep wheels spinning is made the implicit end of life; should wheels once cease spinning, then life itself may be discarded; so affirms our civilization.

No one charges that the sturdy self-reliance of the landlord or property holder is undermined because he has taken out fire insurance; that the municipality is unduly paternalistic because it not only demands fireproof construction but also insists on sending fire-fighting apparatus to combat fire should it break out. Yet, when the country is laid waste by unemployment, those living in asbestos houses cry "dole" and seek to defeat organized preventative measures; they pluck forth the weary ghosts of 1776 with their bucket brigade social ideas to combat the social fires of 1933.

While the economic consequences of unprotected unemployment, because of its destruction of purchasing power and so of the productive wealth of the country, cannot be exaggerated; while economic instability can only be magnified as long as the vicious spiral generated by unemployment continues unchecked to precipitate business into the stagnant gulfs of depression; while the first steps of eventual recovery must come through a restoration of purchasing power; and while economic stability in the future must be looked for in the assurance of a constant cushion of reserve funds sufficient to meet the normal daily expenditures of a man while he is temporarily unconnected with a job—yet, it is unnecessarily to distort the picture to neglect the obligations of society. They are obligations which may justly be called moral. Society must provide security to those who have nothing beyond their bodies, their native physical wealth and mental ingenuity, to invest in the productive enterprises that enable society at large to exist and to divert its energies in other directions.

We have long emphasized the virtues of civic liberty. The habit grew when economic liberty could be taken for granted. The destruction of the latter, however, ruthlessly involves destruction of the former. Pæans sung to political liberty will forever remain anachronistic chantings while economic security remains unrestored.

If profits can be socially justified as the reward of business risk, then the least reward society can offer to those who bear the real physical burden of this risk today is security; the guaranty that that which has been gathered together during a lifetime of work, the mark of social respectability, shall not, together with health and hope, be swept away. Only in the face of such an assurance can the pipings of progress reveal more than hypocrisy blatant, can they show more than a stubbornly blind refusal to face the full implications of modern industrial interdependence.

This Nation will not have reached industrial maturity until the day on which it recognizes, accepts, and provides for the common risks of industry.

A. THREE BROTHERS AND AN AMOEBA: FLOW AND OUTLETS

The amoeba is an interesting animal. Examined it reveals a ceaseless flow of constant activity. Pseudopodia, while influenced by external stimulants, are inherently directionless, illogical; slipping down the path of least resistance, they are quickened by self-generating forces within the organism itself toward the quest for food. Placed in a sympathetic environment the amoeba is unquestionably healthy, active, and urged on by the gusto of its own greed. Placed in a dilemma, in an inclosure from which there is no escape, no outlet for its abundant flow, no space to absorb the elimination of its waste material, it rapidly consumes itself and dies. Without the power of rationalization, or means to act upon it were it given it, the amoeba's fate is certain. The amoeba's well-being is dependent upon a number of given circumstances in its environment. Without restoration of these circumstances, without adequate substitutions, the amoeba must die.

For a century and more a guardian angel has kept watch over the growth and development of the world amoeba, capitalism. Gold it must have to eat and room to expand. Save in its multitudinous producing units it is not the result of any conscious design on the part of those who have lived and are living under its so called system. In America a series of fortuitous accidents, of favorable circumstances conducive to growth, have, throughout its entire history, enabled its expansion, its sprawling over first an empty continent and then over parts of a still wanting world, without having considered once the purpose or end toward which this expression of ceaseless turmoil, of frantic activity, might conceivably be directed. Only in each of its producing units is the answer to be found: the quest for profit, gold food.

Twice has the discovery of new gold thrust the ebb-tide of falling world prices into a stimulating springtide and enabled a relatively constipated credit structure to gush forth into new expansion. California gold in 1849 brought to an end a 25-year period of sagging prices, and, joined with a chain of fortunate warfare, thrust capitalistic development to a new high peak that did not sag until after the Franco-Prussian War had stilled a rush of new orders in the early seventies. African and Alaskan gold, a cheap extraction process, supplied the necessary lubrication to the world imperialist expansion and industrial activity of pre-war years, when from two thirds to three fourths of all gold ever mined assured men that crops could still be grown and the investigations of science utilized.[1] The World War provided America for a time with an intoxicatingly hopeful new area of market absorption, besides eliminating large quantities of the waste materials of the amœbic world, the unemployed. Now all eyes are raised hopefully to Heaven and to India, where reports of untouched gold are stirring.

While over the period at large circumstance seems to have molded itself with rare concern for the welfare of the amoeba, periodic pressures have occurred. Often the new vacuum or gap, determining the next area of expansion, was not immediately apparent. And where a vacuum has not naturally existed, or where one has not been created by warfare, or earthquake, or invention opening up new want, capitalism has periodically been given to creating its own by self-starvation methods called "sabotage", "crop destruction", and "restriction of production." Then booming it has flowed in to fill the gap. It has not yet been forced to carry self-starvation to its logical conclusion. Circumstance has been prolific in its distribution of gaps.

Where, today, is the new gap?

A brief consideration of the nature of old gaps and of the growth of the organism as it leaped to fill them would lend much perspective to any viewing of the problem as it exists today. The old way out by self-starvation just is not working. Circumstance is not always dependable.[2]

James Watt Prometheus had no vision of an age of power-driven machinery. It happened that by the time the steam pump first made itself useful removing water from flooded coal mines, the English middle class had fashioned an effective factory system of its own. The enclosure movement, beginning with the growing importance of the woolen industry and carrying through the scientific development of agricultural production, had succeeded in furnishing the necessary number of men dispossessed from ownership either of land or of their own tools of production. Cotton spinning had grown to outrank in importance England's earlier discovery of the golden fleece. Division and therefore specialization of labor was fully recognized. Standardization had been introduced. And these are the only requirements for the application of power to machinery. Calvin's burgher god was being increasingly glorified by the new and practical demonstration of divine efficiency that his individualist devotees were earnestly working out on earth. But the relation of machines to man cannot be understood fully without introduction to the battling brothers born of world labor during the Reformation upheaval. Without this introduction one is apt to consider the machine a tool and be puzzled by the so-called "paradox of plenty."

All three of these brothers were fighters. They were born underdogs. They made their way to the top. History through the end of the eighteenth century is largely concerned with their struggle to power in the western world; through the nineteenth century to today with their struggle, often a bickering one,

This statement applies equally (a) to the Napoleonic wars; (b) to the period of the Crimean War, the American Civil War, the Austro-Prussian and the Franco-Prussian Wars; and (c) to the period of time covering the Spanish-American War, the Boer War, the Russo-Japanese War, the Balkan War, and the World War * * *. [2] The feeling that I had been too overflip in this passage worried me. But Mr. Charles M. Schwab on his 71st birthday assures me I had not: "Something will come along to give us a new impetus, some new development that is unseen. I have never lost the feeling that things ultimately will be all right. The United States must go bounding on and on. The great corporate development that began around 1900 brought us out of the depression of 1893, and then came Edison with his electrical devices, and then radio. And so, too, something will come along to give us new impetus. We usually find that something like that takes the nations out of the rut. If I could say what it is, it would not be a new development, would it?" (New York Times, Sunday Feb. 19, 1933.) In the meantime he urges higher tariffs and lower taxes to feed emptier bellies.

to domination over the world and, increasingly in recent years, with their efforts to maintain it, once obtained, against a self-generated opposition. One brother was religiously inclined: his name was Protestantism, a moody sober fellow, now mildly methodistic, now sternly puritan. Supporting and supported by his brothers, his most important weapon was the use of words. He attended assiduously to giving to the dispossessed on earth possessions in heaven, besides constantly holding the torch of moral salvation before his brothers' clutching hands, a torch that both lighted and burned their way during their upward climb. The second brother was more politically inclined, and his name was Democracy. While his weapon too was in a sense the use of inflaming words, he was not unwilling on occasion, both on his brothers' account and on his own, to take to arms. Twice he ran wild—once in 1776; once in 1789. And by steady plugging he has managed, more particularly in the interests of his third brother, to reshape the face of England. This third brother, with whom we are particularly concerned, was economically inclined. He was the hardest worker of the family, and was christened Laissez Faire. Without eloquence and without delight in the use of arms he accomplished much at first by virtue of a plugging zest for work and a gift for effective organization that even then somewhat belied his apparently solitary nature. But on the whole he preferred to keep to himself, worked hard, and relied on the strength of his brothers who found it to their material advantage to wield their weapons in his behalf. It was during these early days that a man named Adam Smith met him and became so fired with his sturdy qualities, ambition, and devotion to his brothers that he wrote a biography that has come down as a standard reference book to this day. He neglected, however, to entitle it "Boyhood Years", and much confusion has since resulted owing to efforts made to explain the mature man in terms of the solitary boy, interested in toy mechanics, sailing ships, farms, and other forms of tangible property, whose story is contained in the Wealth of Nations. For shortly after the appearance of this volume there came into the hands of the lad the weapon with which he finally succeeded in conquering the earth. Power-driven machinery was the weapon he wielded, and weapon it has remained to this day. The changes that this new means to power wrought in the character of Adam Smith's hero as he matured we need not here go into. Suffice it to say success went to his head. He became increasingly gregarious, and, amazed at his own swift rise, fell into the habit of exploiting the myth of his boyhood days, attributing success to his own virtues without reference either to the enormous sources of wealth he gratuitously tapped from the bowels of the earth or to the countless army, constantly increasing, of wage-slaves which ruthlessly he drove with the lash of economic want. Increasingly he grew in self-reliance and might, until finally taking to himself the weapons and strength of his brothers which had so ably cleared his early path, his brothers dwindled and became mere ghosts roaming a rootless earth. For the dispossessed, however, he continued to find possessions in heaven, and arms he incorporated as a supplementary part of his own mighty weapon, the machine. His greatest enemies therefore are those who now say man's treasure is stored here on earth, and who would deprive him of his weapon and make it what it might well be, a tool.

However one wishes to put it, the fact remains that toward the end of the eighteenth century steam power and an elementary factory system joined hands. By the end of the Napoleonic wars steam-driven machinery was ready to show what it could do.

* * * * * * *

Inasmuch as Napoleon had been considerate enough to wreck a continent, England was blessed with a generation's start in the scramble as yet to come. Humbly, England became the workshop of the world, humbly and with one modest eye kept at first on the secrets of her new equipment to see they did not escape. Secrecy did not last long. But that did not seem to matter. Urgently, excitedly, irresponsibly, her goods, trinkets, and even machinery that would one day destroy her, flowed out over the world, itching for markets. Amongst the first shipment of goods to be unloaded in Brazil, in 1824, they lay strewn on the beach—for overcrammed warehouses could not contain them all—were articles glittering strangely under a tropic sun: ice skates, warming pans, and stoves. But in the happy-go-lucky days, before ungentlemanly and unfairly scientific Germans tried actually to find out what people wanted in various lands and to sell it to them, no real problems presented themselves.

But the germ of every problem we have come to know as a hulking giant today was contained in this early free-running capitalism. Production alone then needed to be considered. Pressure generated within was reabsorbed, waste materials easily eliminated; the amoeba was in his bouncingly healthy days. An exhiliratingly elusive expansion of market circumference, coupled with the creation of new industries and rapid growth of old ones, provided for the absorption of new labor, for men torn from old crafts and self-dependence by the undermining of new techniques, for a rapid swallowing of the dispossessed: this was the first sweetly subtle fruit of the new freedom; the right to a certain surplus of factory goods was now transferred to the owner of tools, rather than that of farm goods to the owner of land. The problem of how this surplus might one day be resold, since it could not be consumed by the tool owner, when the claims to wealth of society at large consisted of wages and salaries, did not press. And the existence of fresh geographic areas played an increasingly important part, not only for capital, but for human overflow. As an industry approaches an increasingly inelastic demand, as it draws near its so-called "saturation point", and, if it continues to improve technically from within, there are three and only three ways of absorbing the man-hours of labor contained in it (price reduction may temporarily relieve the pressure through market expansion, but this cannot go on indefinitely): (1) Man-hours may be withdrawn by a shortening of the hours of labor in accordance with increased productivity per man-hour; (2) the surplus of man-hours may be reabsorbed into an expanding demand created by new industries or into distribution services; goods cannot find their own way about the world; (3) man-hours may walk away on their own two feet into new geographic regions; emigration.

A stimulating environment served constantly to relieve young capitalism from facing either the problem of stagnant capital or of stagnant men. These young giants lay reasonably at peace within their mother's womb. Toward midcentury, however, a German Jew living in England did notice a swelling of the capitalist belly, which at the time was taken for fat by cheering economists.

Emigration for almost a century was a safety valve for the army of surplus labor and rootless men: However great the expansion, industry must involve a certain degree of fluctuating unemployment. Old skills are made worthless. Industries decay. In cyclical depression the workers are spun from the economic wheel helpless but for their two bare hands. Temporary lay-offs are a constant threat at the flow of daily bread; market demand is really known only when buying ceases; up to that point it is assumed to be limitless. Small businesses and trades are increasingly weeded out; the very struggle against being forced into the ranks of the dispossessed makes for combination, and the weeding out of those who fight for independence into dependence. So while chronic unemployment did not make its pressure felt for many years, hordes of men knew in their own lives the horrors of industrial unemployment before it was recognized by economic physicians as a definite malady. An increasing demand for new labor furthermore is in itself no cure for this unemployment, for demand is in itself qualified by specialization. Therefore emigration meant far more than a mere safety valve for a system, it was new life for those who undertook it.

When Micawber leaves England for Australia the reader is led by Dickens to believe: Now all is well; a new land can and will support his mighty tread. The problem is solved.

By 1850, emigration funds were established means of protection set up by many of the British craft unions. The Flint glassmakers, for example, supplying £20 a person, sent their unemployed to Australia. And it was a sound investment. For the concentrated mass of idle labor constituted an ever-present threat to those still employed as long as it remained in the region. It gave new strength to the bargaining power of the owners, was a weapon placed in their hands for keeping wages depressed. It meant that heaven for the employer, the easy labor market. And so emigration meant not only self-respect, hope, and the chance at gaining a foothold on life for the footless, but it meant also a better standard of living for those who remained. In short, while the opportunity for emigration remained, life flickered on the worker's horizon.

Between 1876 and 1906 it is estimated by Sir William Beveridge,[1] that upwards of 4,000,000 workers left England for Canada and Australia. A study conducted by the national bureau of economic research, Migration and Business Cycles, reveals that emigration from England to this country increased regularly as unemployment figures climbed at home. The Unemployed Workman's Act of 1905 recognized emigration officially as a move that necessity would force the State to encourage.

* * * * * * *

I have remained in England this long for a particular reason: The nature of its haphazard industrial expansion parallels that of America so closely in essential respects that it affords a continually convenient background.

There is but one radical difference. English labor in its own defense early became vocal. A sense of solidarity was generated that never was paralleled in America. Today the British social insurance system is an expression of a labor movement driven to self-consciousness. In America the labor movement constantly was broken down, not only by geographic expanses, but by savage interclass conflict, and by the long-continued importation of gangs of cheap labor from Central Europe. This latter move on the part of industrialists served particularly as a club to beat down any organized system of collective bargaining. Bargaining grounds simply were swept out from under the feet of bargainers. The consequent weakness and chaos of the American labor movement, the gullibility of its accepted spokesmen, is a root cause of the unprecedented disaster into which the country is plunged today. In comparing England and America, then, this must be borne in mind.

As the world was to English industrialism, so was the frontier, 3,000 miles deep, to American; it, too, represented opportunity ever lingering on the horizon, ever beckoning; it, too, seemed indefinitely to postpone the day of problem-facing. As English industrialism set out neither to settle nor to civilize the world, save insofar as peaceful conditions would foster its business interests, so American industrialism set out neither to settle nor make civilized a continent, but to guzzle off it. As the myth of the "white man's burden" molded itself to make spiritual a fundamentally practical and self-seeking job, so the myth of the "Pioneer Spirit", embronzed in the visionary stare of an ever-onward-stepping pioneer woman, carried the self-gorging manipulators of industry in mental covered wagons toward manifest destiny; its magic wand transformed in their own eyes the merchants, bankers, land speculators, and industrialists that spewed across the countryside for plunder into the actual pioneers, hunters, and settlers that had sought escape, freedom, and adventure from growing pressure behind. And, finally, as the world market, narrowing, produced its own ships and those staples it had once bought from England, so, too, the last frontier was reached, the last free homestead land opened, and a mass of self-made men were left in England and in America, some still seeing the limitless markets of the world before them and centuries of free-trade paradise, some still seeing ever-new frontier lands open to expansion, open, too, for the free feet of self-dependent men, and a continent still to be subdued and built.

B. DON QUIXOTE

The problem of unemployment, the direct offspring of industrialization, cannot today be effectively met until it is clear what psychological as well as material debris must be cleared away. That is my one excuse for such an apparently indirect approach to the subject. That it is justified will be made clear.

Cervantes made great sport of a man who felt himself living in an age that had long since passed from reality. So intensely did Don Quixote live his dream that even the most common features of objective reality were distorted to accommodate his subjective pattern. To meet a Don Quixote is a commonplace of everyday life. He presents at once a mixed problem. In private life he is harmless and somewhat touching. His bewildered assertiveness is at once tragic and amusing. But when the assertions of a Don Quixote, owing to the chance authority of public office, have power to influence the thought and action of men at large, then, however unintentionally, they become a dangerously malignant force in society.

Someone has said: "It requires a peculiar penetration to discover what in all discussions we are unconsciously taking for granted."

For a moment let us consider the following words in the light of the America of 1931 when they were uttered: "There has been a constant gain in knowledge and education; there has been continuous advance in science and invention; there has been a distinct gain in public health. I am opposed to any direct or indirect Government dole. The breakdown and increased unemployment in Europe are due in part to such practices. Our people are providing against distress from unemployment in true American fashion [4] by a magnificent response to public appeal and by action of the local governments. If the individual surrenders his own initiative and responsibilities, he is surrendering his own freedom and his own liberty."

Nothing would be gained if it were merely a question of juggling with the words of one man. President Hoover has passed into the limbo of forgotten men." Former President Hoover's conception of a government to which the people pay taxes and owe allegiance, but which has no direct responsibility to them, even when they are starving, is not only repugnant to true Americanism but has been repudiated by every enlightened country in the world, as well as by our own electorate in the fall of 1932."[5] But there happen still to be a great many, in positions of power, who have applauded just such ideas as are voiced above by the ex-President, and who would fight to enforce a preservation of the dreamland from which they spring: a land swarming with ghostly covered wagons * * * whither bound?

What sort of world does the first sentence, for example, take for granted? It is a benevolently together-working world where the means by which potential wealth is realized plays no part; science and invention have bounded forward tremendously; machinery can produce more than it could 20 years ago; the per-acre productivity of fields has increased; but no one of these things in a profit economy means wealth in itself—rather the opposite of wealth. It ignores the world of the sagging price level in which each owner in fierce panic strikes desperately out for himself and strikes others down in so doing; it ignores the world of unemployment, of wage and salary cuts, of temporary lay-offs, job-staggering, part-time work, decreased income of farmers, the world of savage self-interest and destruction at last of physical wealth itself for the sake of money wealth. It ignores, in other words, the chief conflict of today; whether or not fecundity of soil and fertility of scientific invention expressed in the tangible reality of abundance must be forever nullified by the wholly intangible mental realities of the financial structure. It is physical starvation versus imaginary wealth. In addition the naive optimism expressed over the apparent condition of public health betrays an ignorance which it is unnecessary at the moment to go into, but which, coming from assumedly responsible lips, is dangerously misleading. Competent physicians are better spokesmen here.

Sentence number two suggests the nonexistence of an interdependent industrial world. It deliberately distorts the picture of mature European social realization of unemployment as a phenomenon of industry and seeks to forestall the planning of an American attack, aware of European shortcomings, on the same subject. It neglects the very obvious economic advantages of unemployment benefits in a world where wholesale joblessness means the collapse of consumer purchasing power, and with it the collapse of independent retail dealers, grocers, bakers, druggists, and, in cumulative community collapse, that of banks themselves. It assumes that the panic efforts of local communities to stave off starvation are not only effective but that it is logical to put the burden on the most distressed areas and on the shoulders of those least able to support it. How successful would local relief have been had that policy been applied in Belgium?

And the last sentence is perhaps the most tragically blind of all, for in it is concealed the germ of the philosophy shaping the whole quixotic utterance. It is not so much the words but continued emphasis on the ideas they clothe that serves to place added burdens of shame on men who feel they ought, somehow, through the physical powers of their body, through the agility of their minds, somewhere, sometime, to be able to preserve themselves and their wives and families from the rising tide of poverty in an abundant world. Such words serve to make men shift the blame for their inability to find work from a maladjusted society denying them opportunity to their own shoulders, and not only destroy initative and self-confidence but leave in their place a morbid sense of inferiority; and they leave an added sting of degradation when private charity must dole out vitamins and calories because self-reliant men are not to be trusted in making their own purchases. Do dividend payments undermine freedom and liberty? Must capital be employed to enable such payments to continue? Do they not rather emphasize the fact that it is economic security alone that can secure a man any sense of freedom and allow initiative the liberty of expressing itself today?

It is indeed ironic that it should have been Mr. Hoover's own conservative committee appointed to report on recent social trends that so soberly annihilated pretention to material foundation for his beliefs: "There is", finds the committee, "in our social organizations an institutional inertia, and in our social philosophies a tradition of rigidity. The alternative to constructive social initiative may conceivably be a prolongation of a policy of drift and some readjustment as time goes on. Unless there can be a more impressive integration of social skills and fusing of social purposes than is revealed by recent trends, there can be no assurance that these alternatives with their accompaniments of violent revolutions, dark periods of serious repression of libertarian and democratic forms, the proscription and loss of many useful elements in the present productive system, can be averted. The committee does not wish to assume an attitude of alarmist irresponsibility, but it would be highly negligent to gloss over the stark and bitter realities of the social situation, and to ignore the imminent perils in further advance of our heavy technical machinery over crumbling roads and shaking bridges." Even pioneers realized that once they had arrived, there was a community to organize.

C. POWER MACHINERY WITHOUT OUTLETS

Confronting us is a world in which the application of power to machinery has taken place. What has it done? It has made millions, from the teeming wage-paid army of unskilled labor to the salaried ranks of clerks and managers, utterly dependent on its continued functioning. It has transplanted men to factories where no food grows. It has taken the tools of production from men's hands and made them helpless. It has removed the burden of growing grain, of weaving clothes, of building houses from the back of this man or of that and made it the burden of society. And where returns in material riches might conceivably have been stupendous, poverty, starvation, filthy dwellings, nakedness, and, more than ever, insecurity and dread of old age, still stare the masses in the face. The rotting cores of a thousand cities still send their concentrated stink to high heaven. And, worst of all, an increasing army of despair, the army of peace, stepping to the drumbeat of rumor, marches on in its never-ending directionless quest for an ever-receding nowhere.

There is more than a mere paradox involved.

Many, many times have answers been put forward, answers intended to deal with the question raised by the appearance of starvation stalking amid plenty. The intelligent voice of the entire nineteenth century still echoes its indignantly bewildered "Why?"

And just as cheap cotton clothing waved as a flag of triumph by early capitalists in the faces of reformers pointing to exploited misery toiling 17 and 18 hours a day in coal mine and cotton mill failed in settling the question then, so must the purring of 20,000,000 automobiles, the roar of 3,000,000 flush toilets, the morning crunching of 87 brands of breakfast food, the jangling of 12,000,000 telephones in America today fail utterly in drowning out this still persistent, Why?

The answer after a century of demonstration, even if it were not realized that the machine is essentially a weapon in the hands that wield it and not a mere tool, should be fairly obvious: However much undeniable material goods may sugarcoat the capitalist pill, however much the recital of columns of production figures may ease society's conscience, however lustily the chant of "Service" may ring, the overflow of goods has never been channeled toward the producing masses save as a necessary byproduct of a profit economy. If men at large have benefited, then it is because wages are a practical as well as an ethical necessity. That capitalism is trembling under its own burden of plenty today is an indication that the ethical nature of wages has until too recently obscured the practical.[6] And the question is now not, How can this burden be lightened by channeling it toward the satisfying of want?, but, Can it be destroyed rapidly enough to prevent financial collapse?

The Hoover Committee on Recent Economic Changes had this to report in 1929: "The committee finds * * * that as a people we have become steadily less concerned about the primary needs—food, clothing, and shelter. We have long since lost all fear concerning our food supply, and so we no longer look on food as a luxury or as a primary source of pleasure. With greater knowledge of consuming habits, with more accurate records of the goods consumed, a sensitive contact has been established between the factors of production and consumption which formerly were so often out of balance. As long as the appetite for goods and services is practically insatiable, as it appears to be, and as long as productivity can be consistently increased, it would seem that we can go on with increasing activity."

In part the hopes of the Hoover committee might be said to have been confirmed and realized by subsequent events. Our productive capacity has increased; food is even less a luxury or primary source of pleasure than it was in 1929; certainly there has been evidence of a yawning insatiable appetite such as our land has not known. But lest there still be any confusion as to the essential purpose of power machinery, as to the need for redirection; lest the conflict of weapon versus tool be not clearly seen, let us take a look at the food men eat, the clothes they wear, the dwellings they inhabit once the profit motive for supplying these necessities has been withdrawn.

Take one little example:

On June 25, 1932, 52,000 families, who up to that time had been receiving charity food relief in Philadelphia, were informed that funds had been exhausted. What did they do? There was no food relief for 3 months. A survey was made of 400 families. They answer the question for the 52,000.

"But what of food, the never-ending, ever-pressing necessity for food? In this emergency the outstanding contribution has been made by neighbors. The poor are looking after the poor. In considerably more than a third of the 400 families the chief source of actual subsistence when grocery orders stopped was the neighbors. The supply was by no means regular or adequate; but in the last analysis, when all other resources failed, the neighbors rallied to tide the family over a few days. Usually it was leftovers, stale bread, meat bones for soup, a bowl of gravy. One neighbor sent two eggs a day regularly to a sick man threatened with tuberculosis. This help was the more striking since the neighbors themselves were often close to the line of destitution and could illy spare the food they shared. The primitive communism existing among these people was a constant surprise to the visitors. Without this mutual help the situation of many of the families would have been desperate.

"When the content of these meals is taken into consideration the facts are still more alarming. Four families had absolutely no solid food whatever; nothing but a drink, usually tea or coffee. Seventy-three others had only one food and one drink for all meals, the food in many cases being bread made from Red Cross flour. Even in the remaining cases, where there were 2 or 3 articles of food, the diets, day after day and week after week, consisted usually of bread, macaroni, spaghetti, potatoes, with milk for the children. Many families were getting no meat and very few vegetables. Fresh fruits were never mentioned, although it is possible that the family might pick these up in the streets occasionally.

"They kept alive from day to day, catch-as-catch-can, reduced for actual subsistence to something of the status of a stray cat prowling for food, for which a kindly soul occasionally sets out a plate of table scraps or a saucer of milk. What this does to the innate dignity of the human soul is not difficult to guess. What it does to the bodies and the social attitudes of adults and children is something that we shall know more and more about for years to come."[7]

While the garbage dumps of every large city of the country crawl with their human vermin grubbing for food, see now the lodgings provided for them by these same cities:

"The single men go to flophouses. Among the high whitewashed walls of an old furniture factory, the soiled yellow plaster and the scrawled and punctured blackboards of an old public school, the scraped-out offices and pompous paneling of a ghastly old courthouse; on the floors befouled with spit, in the pepperysweetish stink of cooking food, sulphur fumigations, bug exterminators, rank urinals embalmed with creosote—elements figuring more or less prominently as one goes from room to room, floor to floor, but all fused in the stagnant smell of humanity; they eat their chicken feed and slum amid the deafening clanking of trays and dump the slops in galvanized iron cans. They send their clothes to be fumigated and, if they are wet with the winter rain, ruined. They herd into steaming showers, the young still building some flesh on straight frames, the old with flat chests, skinny arms, and round sagging bellies; and they flop at last on the Army cots or in their bunks in double tiers, where the windows, shut against the piercing cold keep in the sour smell; men in holey socks and slit union suits, men tattooed with fancy pictures or the emblems of some service they have left, resting bunioned feet taken out of flattened shoes or flat arches wound around with adhesive tape, lying with newspapers for pillows, their arms behind their heads or with a sheet pulled over their faces or wrapped up in blankets rigid on their backs, their skins stretched tight over their jawbones so that they seem almost like the jaws of the dead. Yet Chicago has been apparently rather conspicuously efficient in providing and running these shelters."[8]

It would be highly shocking if the word "service" in the mouth of a practicing physician were suddenly and openly to mean: "Let's see what you've got, first"; yet there is applause when service-to-the-community, slipping greased from the tongues of the pioneers of the new profession of high finance, most patently means just that. The assumption is that food, clothing, and shelter are less urgently needed by the human body than medicine; that the life of the community may be dependent on financial whim,[9] its health on scientific skill.

D. WAR COORDINATION AND NEW OUTLETS

Not always has America allowed herself to depend on whim for her national well-being. In war-time, amœbic pseudopodia are channeled; energy is directed toward a given end.

"Promptly upon entering the World War, the United States followed the example of its allies and opponents by seeking to mobilize economic resources behind its military program. With extraordinary rapidity the Federal Government not only became incomparably the greatest employer in the country, incomparably the greatest buyer of goods—all of which it had become in earlier wars—but it also assumed direct control over fundamental economic activities. It took the railroads and many of the ships out of private hands. It regulated exports and imports systematically by licenses. It gave priorities in transportation, materials, and use of men to producers of war materials, and purposely repressed industries nonessential to military efficiency or civilian morale. It intervened between employer and employee through the war labor boards. It set up a Food Administration and a Fuel Administration. It fixed maximum and minimum prices for thousands of commodities. And it imposed all these drastic restrictions upon private initiative and free enterprise through the zealous cooperation of hundreds of business executives who served as officials on nominal pay.

"Despite the wastes and confusion attending upon this sudden overturn in economic organization, the mobilization served its purpose. In retrospect it offers a significant illustration of the rapidity and the success with which a people can recast its Old-fashioned attitudes toward work persist under urban factory conditions. Much confusion is engendered * * * by the gradual crumbling of many solid dependable beliefs which sustained the people of the nineteenth century." (Rec. Soc. Trends.)

[9] By "whim" I do not mean to imply that there exists an inherent quality of capricious Sadism in this or that representative of the business world: It is applied only to the inevitable instability of a system dependent upon a multitude of individual decisions—consumers, producers, and investors—and against the cumulative effect of which no one individual, no matter how well-intentioned he be, no matter how essential to the welfare of the community the commodity he handles may be, can possibly struggle. The individual, to remain in business is bound to the profit rules of the game. And these, whim, or a multitude of whims, determine.

basic institutions at need. Seemingly, what engineers regard as the slow pace of change in economic organization is due more to absence of unity in will and purpose than to lack of capacity to imagine and carry out alterations. In 1917 the country was nearly unanimous in putting victory in the war above all other aims. In this supreme aim it had a criterion sufficiently definite to determine what should be done. No similar revolution could be effected in times of peace, unless a similar agreement in purpose, supplying an equally definite criterion of social values, could be attained. But is it beyond the range of men's capacity some day to take the enhancement of social welfare as seriously as our generation took the winning of a war?" [10]

But besides industrial cooperation, certain other war-time developments are to be noted.

"At the beginning of 1917 there were some 40,000,000 able-bodied workers in the United States. Under the economic system prevailing at the time, the 40,000,000 working in fields, factories, stores, offices, provided an amount of goods and services, which, while enormous in the aggregate, was still insufficient to procure for the majority of the population what the United States Department of Labor Statistics terms a 'minimum budget of health and decency.' This budget called for food, shelter, and clothing, plus a few modest comforts, and, for a family of a father, mother, and three children, ran in the neighborhood of $1,700 a year. Less than a third of the families in America were receiving as much as this, and accordingly modern industrialism, whatever else its virtues, did not provide enough to go round in terms of houses, shoes, overcoats, bread, milk, schooling, and health protection. The slums of the great cities, the condition of the tenant farmer, the plight of the small shopkeeper and often the small professional man, confirmed this evidence. Of the reasonable comforts there was a great shortage; of the prime necessities, particularly housing, there was shortage enough." [11]

Thus America stood in 1917. That the war created a stimulating gap into which American goods could be rushed, has been commented upon. What has not generally obtained notice was the temporary resubstitution of another gap, a gap which withdrew surplus man-hours from industry which new geographical areas formerly provided for through emigration and homesteading projects.[12] Into the vacuum provided by nonproductive war-time jobs, the Army and the Navy, miscellaneous war-time activities, manufacturing devoted specifically to war materials, were drained off, at a conservative estimate, 25 percent of the gainfully employed. The Secretary of War lists 11,400,000 absorbed into nonproductive jobs. Each one of the men withdrawn from productive activities represents the withdrawal of a certain number of man-hours of labor.

With one fourth less labor-hours at its command, what happened to American industrial output—to the standards of living of those dependent upon it—during the war period?

Total output did not fall. It increased in volume of production from 100 in 1914 to 127.7 in 1919.[13]

Hours of labor for those employed were not increased. They dropped, owing to increased bargaining power, on an average of 5 hours per week between 1914 and 1919. And over the same period trade-union membership reached an almost all-time high point, outdone only by the succeeding 2 years, increasing from 2,716,900 in 1914 to 4,169,100 in 1919.[14]

In the same way labor's bargaining power increased the average annual earnings of employed wage earners from $613 in 1914 to $1,144 in 1919; or, reflected in an index of real earnings, from 100 in 1914 to 105 in 1919.

In other words, owing to an artificially induced scarcity of labor-hours, America suddenly realized a standard of living such as she had never known before. Men were in demand at any price. In spite of climbing price levels, constantly increasing incomes meant a steadily increasing absorptive capacity in purchasing power. For 2 years and more a sense of security came into the worker's life. He could buy; he did buy; output was steadily absorbed. Three factors stepped in to fill the gap created by the withdrawal of man-hours from American industry: (1) New standardization methods of mass production were introduced, and wastes were ruthlessly eliminated; (2) restriction of essential goods by capitalist sabotage ceased on the assurance of constant market demand, and goods flowed freely from the factories; (3) the consuming power of the workers, in relation to the total income of the nation, increased from 68.9 percent in 1917 to 77.3 percent in 1918. In 1916 the upper 5 percent of income levels received $14,300,000,000, or 34 percent of the national wealth; in 1919 they received $15,500,000,000, or only 24 percent of the national wealth. A combination of the first two factors meant an increasing flow of essential commodities which, finding in the third factor a steadily expanding market, the growing effective demand of an income group that above all others craved just such essentials, resulted in the possibility of continued capacity production and a new standard of living for America as a whole.

"Now it really does appeal to one's common sense as preposterous," writes David Friday in Profits, Wages, and Prices, "that the laborers should be thoroughly employed at good wages and should enjoy a high standard of living when the Nation was wasting $15,000,000,000 a year upon war, but should find it impossible to maintain that standard when the waste of products had ceased. When one compares the tone of American life during the spring and summer of 1918 with the state of public opinion and industrial activity of 1920, he wonders whether peace is really a blessing."

For a few brief years then the American productive machine showed what it could do under pressure of cooperation, even when cooperating to kill Germans, when its goal was first of all effective distribution and production; secondly, profit; though one did not bar out the other, when it was reprovided with two of the essential pseudopodic gaps, expanding markets at home and abroad, and an overflow for unnecessary man-hours of labor, demanding concentration on essentials.

It is no wonder that there were many at the end of that period who began to speculate what the outcome might be if American industrial and inventive forces should unite their profit seeking and scientific urges in one drive toward a new end, a new destruction; the destruction this time of slums, of mass-poverty, of hunger at home, of ugliness, of disease, of industrial insecurity, of dependent old age, of unemployment, and of wholesale waste, thus providing for one essential gap in the yawning desire of an untouched home market, and providing for the other in the withdrawal of man-hours from industry, hours proved no longer, or rather decreasingly, required with the introduction of new productive techniques, into leisure and recreation with the firm ground of economic security under foot, rather than in the casting of men into haunted idleness with sifting quicksands of economic insecurity to tread upon.

But this most certainly was not to be.

Normalcy was just around the corner.

E. WAR COORDINATION AND FLOW: EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Before moving with the straggling parade down the avenues of the New Era, the bland easy smile of its band leader drives one back to present more emphatically one other development of war-time alertness.

Public employment agencies were not unknown in America before the war. All students of unemployment have recognized that: "A well-functioning system of public-labor exchanges could, by an organized and more rapid dissemination of information upon jobs to be had and workers desiring work, reduce the amount of time lost in job-getting and in the securing of labor by employers." Such a coordinated system of public-employment bureaus was seen by their advocates as a nation-wide chain, "centers which would make a specialty of knowledge regarding available jobs—where they are, how many, what they are, the type of ability they call for, and so forth—and also a specialty of knowledge regarding available workers, where they can be found, the number, what in general are their experience and capabilities. In other words these bureaus would eliminate waste and unnecessary idleness resulting from the irregular and ignorant efforts of individuals to find work or to secure workers." [15]

In 1907 a division of information was set up within the Bureau of Immigration "to promote a beneficial distribution of aliens admitted into the United States among the several States and Territories desiring immigration." In 1914, on the decline of immigration, this evolved into a strange attempt to further employment service by the creation of a Nation-wide cooperative system that linked up local employment bureaus, the national farm labor exchange, and the Postal Service—all under the control of immigration personnel.[16]

Between 1910 and 1916 there were seven studies made of unemployment in the United States. Of these not one failed in urging as an immediately necessary step the establishment of public employment offices. It was clearly recognized that not only the continuous transitional shifts required by modern industry as it spews forth and gobbles up labor demanded some means of channeling the labor flow over vast geographic areas that would be of service to both employer and employee through creating facilities for interstate transportation, but that also the abysmal ignorance concerning the degree of unemployment, the demand of the labor market, could never be effectively filled with knowledge until there were in existence regular and recognized centers in industrial and agricultural areas, where those seeking work could register according to trade and skill, where those seeking wokers could make their desires known in specified terms.

Certain States and municipalities had experimented with the idea. By 1905 there were 37 offices in 15 States; in 1913, 67 offices in 21 States. Wisconsin was well in the lead in efficiency and administrative methods. Offices in Milwaukee were conducted under an examining board representing the Industrial and Civil Service Commission, employers, and workers. The first generally coherent State system was produced by Ohio in 1917. As early as 1914 a bill was presented in Congress calling for a Federally administered service. It recognized clearly that cities and not States were the industrial and commercial units of the country, and that only by Federal cooperation with municipalities could an effective labor exchange and bureau of central information be achieved. But as long as an easy labor market remained, zeal on the part of those in power was not stimulated. The Murdock bill was not even voted on.

Then came the war.

A magic wand waved through the air.

Cinderella sitting by the fireside, scorned by her proud sisters, neglected by men, was transformed into the most sought-after beauty in all the wide, wide land. Even a prince went hunting.

Fairy godmother had transformed labor from a rather cheap commodity into one highly prized. It became expedient to facilitate its chaotic flow. The hodge-podge of 1914 was miserably inadequate. The United States Employment Service sprang into active being in early 1918. The National Association of Manufacturers saw clearly that such a move was now truly desirable,—that to own a slipper without a princess was nothing at all. State and municipal bureaus were linked up. Federal agencies were established. A revolving fund was set up that labor might be transported to and from strategic points. For a time gate-to-gate, newspaper-to-newspaper, employer-to-employer, hunch-to-hunch, and doubt-to-fear job-seeking vanished.

Then peace set in.

The army came home. It was demobilized. War workers went back to normal jobs, dollar-a-year men to normalcy. Post-war activity, the soft cushion of purchasing power labor had provided for itself, bolstered industry for a time. It swallowed without immediately vomiting the new man-hours poured down its throat. There was a vast amount of building and shipping to be done. The hastily formed war-time service began to readjust itself to peace demands, to seriously study the problem of finding the right jobs for the right men.

As suggested, the problem was no longer one of finding men for jobs; it was that of finding jobs for men. The National Association of Manufacturers had time to think things through more carefully.[17] Many overhasty, unwise steps had been taken during the war. The question now arose as to whether or not the United States Employment Service should continue. Efforts were made to expand and increase its efficiency, to place it on a sound and permanent basis under nonpolitical Civil Service authorities. But the sag toward normalcy was overpowering.

But the question was no longer one of finding men for jobs; it slowly became rather one of finding jobs for men. So little had the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization gleaned from the war that in 1920, protesting against immigration restrictions as a curtailment of our "natural development", it declared there was a labor shortage in the country amounting to not less than 5,000,000 men.[18] The next year the President's Committee on Unemployment was in session attempting to decide whether or not soldiers "did not want to work" and what should be done with 6,000,000 unemployed. Voluntary action by business men was the keynote of the discussion: "When business again declines men will be laid off and the problem of unemployment may again become serious. It will then be too late for any measures except relief for the unemployed unless we now address ourselves to the task of preventing, or at least reducing, these extreme fluctuations of business activity. Prevention as contrasted with relief is possible only through foresight."[19]

After mature consideration the National Association of Manufacturers found that any measure that might tend to increase the bargaining power of workers, such as thinning the reserve hordes knocking always at the factory gate, was indeed unconstitutional. It, too, lusted for normalcy and the old heydays when labor was not a problem but just cheap.[20]

Meager funds only were allowed the Employment Service. The number of offices in existence, which had reached an all-time high of 850 by October of 1919, was drastically slashed. The amounts contributed by States for continuing their own and taking over some of the Federal agencies were, of course, but drops in the bucket.[21] Worse still the tone of public employment agencies fell into dismal decay. The United States Employment Service kept its name, but it passed into the care of second-hand political hacks, and ran no offices solely on its own. Its ambition did not extend beyond shifting a few gangs of extra-hand labor from place to place. Its monthly publication, Industrial Employment Information Bulletin, became and remained the standard source of industrial misinformation for those who troubled to look into it. It consisted of a few odd hunches as to what the situation might turn out to be, furnished by representatives with an ear for gossip throughout the several States of the land. Of course, it did not matter very much for a few years just what the bulletin chose to print. But in 1929 it mattered. In 1930 it mattered. In 1931 it mattered. In 1932, unless torn up first, it mattered. Accurate information in 1933 might matter.[22]

It is to be noted in passing that it was as a result of demobilization that Canada adopted and retained a coordinated system of public employment agencies. The maturity of Europe is therefor not wholly unreflected in North America.

In the meantime the old pot-luck system was in force again in the United States: a two-headed monster of economic waste and private tragedy. So, joining the staggering procession down the years of the new era, came again the blind and weary directionless tramp of men's feet from factory gate to factory gate.

Normalcy had begun.

F. NORMALCY

What is normalcy?

It is a good deal more than just an ungrammatical word.

It is not bothering to look into the dictionary for the right one. The originator of the phrase had a bland easy-going smile. To the local paper he was "Just plain folks."

Applied to one's self it expresses a certain slackness of living. It reflects an unconscious desire to side-step the harsh necessity of decision, to flow with the stream of events haphazardly. In a sense it reflects a mental softness that refuses to reexamine one's emotional reactions in the light of a consciously and deliberately aimed effort toward achieving objectivity.

It is the act of continual postponement. Things are not as bad as they seem; things will work out.

The spirit of normalcy has, slightly bedraggled, slipped on into the winter of 1933.[23]

Relief to families in 76 cities of the United States, representing in 1930 a population of 34,474,000, had mounted as follows:

1929	$40,791,300
1930	66,530,100
1931	160,802,300
1932 (first half)	140,576,078

The increase in funds spent in no way corresponded to the increase in families demanding aid. Funds were spread thinner, relief was denied, local educational and health budgets slashed. At best the R.F.C. had enabled emergency tactics to continue. This meant one thing—increasing emergency.

Each of its 3 representatives stands in varying degree the symbol of an era. I am not attempting to say that had we had other Presidents the tragedy of the last 3 years would necessarily have been averted. The leaders of our democracy are placed in office for it by a convenient slogan reechoing of its mass chant. They are therefore almost invariably expressions of rather than molders of events during their term of office. The last of the line, though outweighing mentally his predecessors, was also a symbol, and, as the flow of events changed in its nature, an anachronism as well. He stood for efficiency, a magic wand that at the time of [17] The line of thought is indicated by the following comment of a representative of one of the national employers' associations: "* * * We believe that the States should run their own services. You see we can get at the States more easily. It's a much tougher proposition to do anything with the Federal Government." (Pub. Emp. Agencies, Russell Sage Foundation.)

[18] Migration and Business Cycles (N.B.E.R.).

[19] Business Cycles and Unemployment: Report and recommendations of a committee of the President's Conference on Unemployment, 1921.

[20] It is always enlightening to study the declarations of the National Association of Manufacturers against the background of circumstance which prods them forth. A recent bill calling for a regulation of the hours of industry to prevent the present Nation-wide collapse of all standards and return to 19th century factory conditions, as well as to afford new opportunity to millions, brought forth this from the association's representative: "The measure is plainly designed to compel each producer to operate under conditions of production which Congress has not the right to determine. It permanently contracts the earning power of the individual and destroys his liberty to advance himself by his own efforts." Their concern for the individual is always touching. But their beliefs as to what Government should or should not do about conditions of production grow confusing. Only a few days later when a slight trickle of imports, still dismally below normal, still representing a larger decrease from currency-depressed countries than those on the gold standard, began to creep over an already disastrously high tariff wall, the situation was one that "calls for special powers of administrative adjustment."

[21] In 1918, $5,500,000 plus a deficiency appropriation of $272,000 was expended by the Federal Government. There were then in existence 773 offices in 605 cities and 48 States and the District of Columbia. In 1920, $1,547,000 was spent maintaining 269 offices in 42 States. The Federal appropriation for that year was $400,000; the remaining $1,147,000 coming from States and municipalities. By 1921 there were 174 offices in operation in 35 States. (Pub. Emp. Agencies—Russell Sage Foundation.)

[22] Since the writing of this report, Miss Frances Perkins has come into the Labor Department. For the first time that Department will probably live up to its name.

[23] The crying need for direct relief, in spite of the evidence submitted before the Senate Committee on Manufactures, was even then not recognized by the Senate. In the fourth winter of depression, confronted by an all-time high of 15,000,000 unemployed, by the rapidly increasing collapse of private charity, by the slow exhaustion of tax funds, by still prevailing haphazard relief measures, by no conceivable glimmer of hope, it still insisted that families first be reduced to destitution, then be allowed to subsist indefinitely or inadequate food rations, as though the gradual pauperization of a living generation were but a dream. On Monday, Feb. 20, 1933, it turned down even the meager appropriation for direct relief proposed by the LaFollette-Costigan bill, replacing it by a feebler substitute, the liberalization of a failure, intended to please the White House.

his election merely in the waving was supposed to work, bolstered by voluntary action, economic wonders; nor were any attempts made during his campaign to dispel the illusion.

The era of normalcy should therefore be rapidly diagnosed. The overemphasis that will bear heavily on factors making for unemployment must be allowed for. Unemployment is the subject of this paper: God is not seated in impartiality on His throne of judgment. But adequate measures for dealing with unemployment can only grow logically from a presentation of the problems involved. To be essentially applicable and coherent, they must be seen as evolving from a given course of events. As suggestions unrelated to time and place, they could only go toward swelling the already turgid mass of panaceas, not only suggested, but some of which are actually engaged in the great work of restoring normalcy and confidence: People are out of work—share the work; people have no money—print more money; budgets cannot be balanced—put on a sales tax; goods are not selling—slash wages; men are starving—toss them food; and so on ad nauseam from the heaven of free silver, through planned economy utopias, to the present-day hell of the R.F.C., local relief, economy drives, and collapsed standards of working conditions, savage wage cuts, and nineteenth-century hours of labor in sweatshops, coal mines, and textile mills.

The whole upper structure of capitalistic civilization seems water-logged, sinking into the forgotten sea on which it once floated, sea now turned foul morass, rotten with poverty, snarls of dulled hollow-eyed men drifting purposelessly across its stagnant surface.

The faith of communism is based upon the inevitable self-generated destruction of capitalism. It is mechanical and certain. It foresees amoebic growth clogging the world. One would be hard put to it to find a logical refutation. It has one major flaw, one not expressed in scientific logic. It denies the living belief that some still hold to, that men, by taking action among themselves, can, within the limits imposed upon them by material environment, determine the course of their own destinies; that they can, by facing the exigencies of necessity, as they arise from the sifting progress of persistent growth, preserve the form of society, readapted to newly evolved conditions, under which they are accustomed to living. Such a belief may be a bourgeois phantasy. Certainly it has not been demonstrated that men living under our present form of capitalism are capable of taking action together. The moments in which they will still be allowed to take action may not extend indefinitely into the future. Mounting scepticism is not layed by postponement.

The task ahead is a strange one. It is not one that requires facing hardship, deprivation, fierce physical struggle. It is rather one of applying determined intelligence to the new facts of an abundant environment—and of realizing in useful wealth its richness. Mental quirks alone are the dams checking its flow. The burden of proof is now on capitalism to demonstrate that capitalism is not synonymous with mental quirk. And a further continuance of the present degree of human degradation and physical suffering is too high a price to pay for a long-drawn-out argument.

II

1923–1929

A. THE CLOGGING OF OUTLETS

Rapidity is the keynote.

A confusion of many tongues still lingers over this period of American industrial development. All that can be done in the quick survey to follow is to grope below the clouds, grasp certain constant tendencies, and remove them for separate inspection. It is only by continuing to see unemployment as a function of the system that produces it that adequate long-range remedies can possibly be applied.

In his volume, Economic Tendencies in the United States, the most broadly adequate report on these post-war years, recently published by the National Bureau of Economic Research in cooperation with the Committee on Recent Economic Changes, Frederick Mills in part concludes the survey: "The expansion which dominated the course of economic events during the third decade of the twentieth century started against a background of violent and unbalanced change. Partly because of the effect of the war and of domestic policy on the course of immigration, partly as a result of slowly acting forces more fundamental in their origin, the factors affecting population growth had been changed. On the industrial side, the full effects of technical innovations and of a changing attitude toward the problems of production were beginning to be felt. A surge forward in productivity, probably exceeding in its intensity and rivaling in the scope and magnitude of its effects the advance which has given the label of 'industrial revolution' to the events of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries in England, was under way. The movement, lowering costs and stimulating production, modifying the returns to producing groups, intensifying the ills of an old evil—unemployment—was to leave a deep impress on the years which followed."

During the course of this paper we have become familiar with certain environmental conditions necessary to the health and continued vigor of the amoeba. It would be well to see how the American amœba stood in 1923, having reassembled its forces after its period of post-war deflation. Two of the three essential outlets presented themselves temporarily unclogged. In Europe there was still a favorable area of destruction remaining to invite manufactured imports—the geographic outlet that in other parts of the world was rapidly clogging. In new industries, outlet was provided for capital expansion and labor absorption—the industrial outlet that without constant relief rapidly tends to clog itself. I emphasize this to invite a more critical attitude toward such plans as the "guarantee of industry" and similar measures seeking primarily to recapture the dream days of boom time without a realistic consideration of present circumstances.

That we suffered from a lack of realism at the time is adequately if not solely demonstrated by the spectacle of our foreign-trade policy stalking the night dressed in the musty costume of seventeenth-century mercantilism howling from its dream for higher tariffs, exports, and gold payments. And even today, our eyes open to depressed world price levels, shrinkage in foreign trade, and departures from the gold standard, though forced from our antiquarian's dream, we choose to see rather the hand of malignant fortune at work than our own grabby little fingers at play.

The credit our business leaders took for our prosperity in 1929 is mighty proof that we tumbled into it not knowing quite where or what it was. A restoration of confidence is not going to yank us out of the pit. No one can claim that confidence was lacking as we fell into it. "Our prophets of gloom and woe are being steadily refuted by the basic health of most of our important industries" crowed the chanticleer of the New York Stock Exchange, President Simmons, a moment before the sun failed to rise. "The business cycle has apparently ceased to operate in its former accustomed manner." Not love alone, but greed also is blind. If the textile industry, the boot-and-shoe industry, shipbuilding, soft-coal mining, railroad-shop construction, and agriculture, all languishing in a chronic illness, can be called basicly healthy, if 152,984 businesses and 2,451 bank failures between 1922 and 1928 are of no importance, then, it is granted, salvation lies in a restoration of confidence. On the other hand, if a structure collapses because it is rotten at the foundation and made of cheap material, merely to restore it, especially after it has lain weatherbeaten on the ground for some time, is not to promise much in the way of sound construction.

One thing these years have done: they have helped clear away much of that mazed tangle of dreams, ghosts, and musty doctrines of an outworn economy that for a time sent vibrant emotionalism singing through the thick voices of practical prophets at banqueting hour. Confidence must wait for something more substantial than the persistent dream of an ever-receding frontier, the ghost words of Adam Smith, and the verbiage of mercantilism to feed upon.

I have mentioned 2 of 3 outlets characteristic of capitalistic development that were still in existence in 1923. The third, the outlet for those who have a supply of labor-hours to offer in excess of demand, was clogged, inevitably in fact, needlessly in fancy. And while our immigration policies recognized the former—the passing of the physical frontier and opportunity for geographic emigration—by restricting the inflow from abroad, our industries reached a mental frontier and no longer provided or sought for further outflow. Though during the course of a century the trail of industry had passed through the land of the 14-hour day, the 12, the 10, and had now come to that of the 8, this it assumed to be not a mere country seen in passing but the promised land itself. Fertile fields ahead were ignored. The outlet afforded through leisure "emigration" was clogged. In the land of the 8-hour day industry proceeded to settle and to establish itself, unaware of a rapidly increasing congestion that immigration restrictions on mere physical boundaries were powerless to prevent.

From within the boundary lines new workmen arose with increasing rapidity. They could be hired, considering the productivity of their working hours, for appallingly little. They had no standards of living. They demanded only that enough be set aside to provide for their replacement in old age. Competition for the American workman did not die with the erection of immigration barriers. And geographically he had no place to which to shift his excess supply of man-hours. Therefore the rise above all of the automobile, creating as it did a multitude of jobs, directly and indirectly, and, to a lesser degree, that of the radio and electrical appliances, assumed tremendous importance during these years. They, together with openings of another character—service, advertising, and selling jobs—for a time served as conduits for our labor overflow, while geographic and leisure outlets were closed.

The Hoover committee report on recent economic changes summarizes the changes effected in American industry during the decade following its war-time speed-up as follows:

An increase in physical volume of product.

An increase in productivity of the individual worker or of the man-hour worked.

An increase in primary power utilized both in total volume and in amount per employee.

An increase in the total amount, and also in the proportion, of horsepower for industrial purposes which is purchased instead of being self-produced.

A decrease in the number of workers employed.

An increase in fixed capital assets; that is, in manufacturing buildings, equipment, and machinery.

A decrease in unit prime cost.

An increase in the attention given, resources available, and funds spent for industrial research.

An increase in the development of new manufacturing materials.

An increase in the development of new manufacturing processes.

An increase in material-handling machinery utilized, both to reduce cost of transporting materials and product to act as a pacemaker for the speed of production.

Reduction in wastage of manufacturing materials and the reclaiming of former waste products through the development of by-products.

An increase in safety of industrial establishments, with safeguarding carried to such a degree that the greater number of industrial accidents are now attributable to supervisory failure, not to physical cause.

An increase in the extent, degree, and quality of artificial illumination.

An improvement in working surroundings and in those physical conditions that can be modified by technological means.

These isolated changes gather themselves into one spearhead: "The first essential thing upon which we must keep our minds centered is that the whole problem arises from the vast expansion of our resources consequent upon the escape of production from the limits of human labor." [24]

Here are the net results taken from Mills' Economic Tendencies mentioned above. Here are reflected American industrial trends:

Average annual rate of change

	Pre-war years, percent	Post-war years, percent
Number of wage earners	+2.2	−1.3
Output per capita	+1.7	+3.3
Average real wages	−.10	+1.4
Common-stock receipts	+1.2	+16.4

The figures mean this: That though industry depends as much on mass consumption as it does on mass production for its continued successful functioning, that though it therefore requires that market and purchasing power expand in proportion to productive capacity, actually during the post-war decade, with no compensating expansion in foreign trade, the monetary returns to owners was rapidly outstripping that of employees; that, measured in terms of unit cost of production, the reward of labor was declining. They mean furthermore that the increased production was owing not to increased employment but to increased per capita productivity. Industry, in other words, was producing more goods, fewer effective consumers.

* * * * * * *

Now all these tendencies were noted by the President's committee in 1929. They are clearly expressed in the graphs and figures presented throughout the two volumes of recent economic changes. Notice, however, the point of view taken toward them: "It is this degree of economic activity, this almost insatiable appetite for goods and services, this abounding production of all things which almost any man can want, which is so striking a characteristic of the period covered by the survey."

Nothing need be said about the bland assumption that the major portion of America was peculiarly aware of "this abounding production of all things which almost any man can want" at this point. The way toward a clearer understanding of what was happening, however, is still blocked by one small but potbellied, greedy little figure, the last of the economic ghosts to be faced—the economic man. He is the gentleman referred to above in the term "insatiable desire." Who is this gentleman who has neither bottom to his belly nor walls to his house who has for so many years led not only economic theorists but hard-headed manufacturers dancing to his delirious pipings? Who is he? How does he dress? Is he one of the millions or one of the millionaires? That is important.

If he is of the millions then his insatiable desire is ineffective. It is of no more than academic interest to the builder of houses that the millions hunger for more and better housing.

If he is of the millionaires then desire is sated before the pocket is emptied—and again it is ineffective. It is of real concern to the builder of houses that once one palace is constructed hunger for more and better palaces is, in most cases, at an end in this lifetime.

While the minuteness of the individual claims to wealth of the millions keeps them bound to the economic treadmill and in a condition of perpetual hunger for this "abounding production" of most of the essentials of life, it is the existence of the few excessive claims to wealth that commands the attention and ingenuity of manufacturers. Pursuing the surplus spending powers of the rich, the economic man leads the chase into an ever-broadening variety of new fields, into unexplored corners of the old. It is just here that he stumbles and lags. It is beyond physical possibility to absorb more and more and more of the essentials of life in accordance with indefinitely expanding income. A man will continue to absorb just so many loaves of bread. Manufacturers attempting to horn in may diversify spending power by creating new fashions and styles in bread consumption, but they will find it hard to increase total consumption. And here they run into another difficulty: they will find their economic man is a creature of habit and has forcibly to be educated into the development of his "insatiable desire." And it will cost a good deal of advertising money to cajole him from raisin to nut bread to gluten. He may not even wait for the educating process to fulfill itself but will place his surplus spending power in the creation of yet another variety of bread and decrease further the earnings of all those already in the game. And in the meantime the millions will hunger for more plain bread. A large part of the new era economic activity was in pursuit of a ghost that died when the nineteenth century was still young. Where the economic man might have been given enough reality to have insured permanent business activity in his pursuit, he was ignored; he was catered to in the one income group where sooner or later surfeit must come to put an end to much of the worthless business machinery set up to stimulate and to invent new and makeshift desires.

So from the last of the ghosts to reality again.

* * * * * * *

The picture of these years must be gotten a little more clearly in mind. All told, some 2,300,000 men stopped working permanently in agriculture, railroading, manufacturing, and coal mining. In the same years there was a population increase of 17,000,000, which should have added from 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 workers to industry. The slack is assumed to have been taken up by an increase in secondary-school and college students of from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. Increased building, which had the war-time lag in resident, factory, and office construction to make up for as well as the supplying of normal demand, opened 300,000 jobs; automobile construction, some 750,000 jobs; hotels created some 500,000 new opportunities; and so on into a miscellaneous chaos from insurance selling to manicuring. Almost every Washington taxicab driver I have questioned this winter was formerly employed in some manufacturing concern, a large majority of them dismissed prior to 1929. Advertising agents and salesmen, "hot-dog" stand tenders, barbers, movie-palace ushers, apartment-house door men, restaurant waiters, elevator boys, and bootleggers tell the story of what happened while industry was pressing men into economic rearrangements. "This failure of factory and railroad employment", to quote Recent Social Trends, "to advance is especially significant, since the gainfully occupied population increased from 42,600,000 to 48,000,000 during these years . . ."

This multitude of various and often makeshift jobs reflects the reasoning behind the economic theory that technological unemployment is an eventual impossibility. Capital surplus must be released; as it is released it tends to create new jobs, room for new service activities, and professional workers. And that is undeniably so. But notice the increasing difficulty with which the economic man creates wants that open new jobs.

This is what was happening. Those industries engaged in supplying the more basic and essential wants of the country at large underwent rapid technological changes. There were many efficiency measures induced by the principles of scientific management. These steps taken together reduced radically the number of labor hours required to produce a given amount. But, as this saving was realized not in a general reduction in the workday but rather in the working force, no correspondingly increased per capita leisure resulted. Men rather than man-hours were withdrawn from industry.[25] The consequent saving from decreased total wage payments added to a declining unit cost of production meant a sharp increase in profits for the owning class. This general trend has been indicated in the figures quoted. Actually the changed relationships between the value of the product, the cost of material, and the value added by manufacture; between the value added by manufacture, wages paid, and amounts going into overhead and profits were revolutionary in the sharpness of their break.

Throughout pre-war development these factors had advanced more or less proportionately. Thrown on a graph the curves show an approximately relative increase. In the first instance the break occurred in 1921; while costs of material became of relatively less importance, the value added by manufacture soared in a rapidly ascending curve through to 1929. In the second instance the break followed the deflation of 1921–22; while wages paid pro-

[24] Henderson, The Economic Consequences of Power Production.

[25] Changes by census periods are shown by the following summary (Economic Tendencies, N.B.E.R.):

Census interva	Increase in output per establishment (percent)	Change in number of workers per establishment (percent)	Increase in output per worker (percent)
1923–25	+10.1	+2.5	+7.3
1925–27	+6.7	+1.4	+5.2
1927–29	+2.6	−5.0	+8.0

ceeded in a somewhat normal line, tending to flatten off and dropping somewhat at the end, the amount going into overhead and profits climbed with increasing intensity. In both cases previous relationships were smashed. In both cases the only direct channels by which income flows to consumer's purchasing power—cost of material and wages paid—suffered at the expense of returns to ownership.

The following table sums up the post-war relationships:

Year	Physical volume of production	Value of products	Cost of materials	Cost of fabrication plus profits	Overhead expenses plus profits	Total wages paid
1923	100	100	100	100	100	100
1929	113	102	98.3	109.3	121	94.3

If men rather than man-hours are to be eliminated from industry, if the remaining wage payments are not to be inflated, if the unit cost of production is to decline, if prices are to remain fairly stationary,[26] the resultant increased "earnings" must find an outlet. Certain consequences must follow:

(1) New wants must be created and manufactured to absorb some of the new earning power of the rich. Yachts, Tudor palaces, elaborate furniture, de luxe editions of books, and luxury articles in general must be made highly desirable.

(2) Excess plant equipment must be constructed on an ever-increasing scale; investment may either flow to an existing factory or build a new one in total disregard of actual market demand. With 90 percent of the population eager to buy more the Bureau of Census reports that American industry even in 1923 was idle 25 percent of the time. The census estimate was based on a comparison between goods actually produced and potential capacity. Here are some of the actual production estimates[27] as compared with capacity:

	Percent
Food and kindred products	57.4
Textiles and their products	79.7
Iron and steel, etc	76.4
Machinery and manufacturing	69.4
Rubber products	70.2
Transportation equipment	65.9
Lumber and allied products	74.7
Stone, clay, and glass	77.6
Flour milling	40.0

And so forth.

This partially illustrates the somewhat tragic and ludicrous, state our industry, even in boom periods, tumbles into. Supply and demand could quite easily be balanced were demand allowed the means to become effective. Instead, industry languishes in a chronic condition of over-production by holding off its most willing consumers and even destroying them.

(3) Intense activity in advertising and distribution must be turned to, in order to consume excess profits and provide jobs clogged by an 8-hour work day in industry. Recent Social Trends reports that advertising matter increased from $98,697,000 in 1923 to $155,122,000 in 1929 in periodicals alone. The average annual bill footed by consumers for the privilege of being told what to buy comes to about $1,280,000,000. What they pay for excessive sales attention and distributive wastes would be difficult to estimate.

(4) Excess profits may indulge themselves by constantly working on new models and styles. They can energize a lethargic demand with schemes of elaboration and a stimulation of fashion changes.

(5) The machinery utilized per worker may be constantly added to with an eye toward further savings in wage reductions and a further speed-up of new production.

(6) And finally surplus capital must be shipped off to Europe or sent to stimulate production in other foreign countries. In the former case it helps preserve the illusion of an active export trade; in the latter case it helps eventually to destroy a favorable balance of trade, in the light in which we regard it today, by stimulating abroad a construction of the very things we like to ship.

There is not a great deal more that can be done with surplus earnings; by surplus I of course mean that which remains after the perpetuation of the original plant has been provided for. So the picture turns a little funny. Mr. Hoover and the Department of Commerce through the Bureau of Standards do yeoman's work investigating ways of eliminating waste from industry. Waste is eliminated by improved process methods, by wholesale cuts in various styles produced, etc.[28] Men are of course eliminated along with the wastes. A "saving" has been made. But what can be done with this "saving", if it is not to be reflected in the sating of mass desire? Nothing practically beyond the creation of new wastes on an unprecedented scale. Income must be spent. Income must be set to inventing traps for the capture of income.[29] And since men rather than man-hours are withdrawn from the more essential industries, surplus men and surplus capital, if they come together, must both be consumed in the production of frills, elaborations, advertising campaigns, supersales service, and distributive wastes.

And here is where the fatal lag sets in. Here is where the economic man stumbles and lags. The desire for the consumption of newly created industrial "wastes" is neither as spontaneous nor as insatiable as is that for the consumption of essentials; those commodities that appeal immediately to the instinctive mental and physical cravings of man. Men have to be persuaded and cajoled into the buying of Old Golds; a nation has to be educated to the use of the radio. But man will turn naturally to more varied diets, better shoes, better clothing, less smelly houses, and recreational pursuits as increased income and leisure allow them. Dahlberg has written a book on the danger to the capitalistic system of this sluggishness induced by the retention of longer hours of labor than are needed in the manufacture of essential goods. The rich can neither, because they are not economic men, spend their surplus profits fast enough on elaborations, frills, and wastes to preserve the necessary flow of consuming power at a constant rate, nor can they provide new job opportunities at a rate commensurate with that at which men are cast from the production of human essentials. "The newer classes of goods", he says, "differ from the old in the spontaneity with which the people with purchasing power demand them * * *."

Business demands that only enough of necessities be produced to provide maximum market returns. Capitalist sabotage is ruthless. Food will be destroyed, crops burned, shipments of fruit thrown into the harbor, factory production restricted, not because of a failure in physical demand, but because physical demand has not been provided with sufficient claims to wealth to make itself effective. So while business turns with all the machinery of oily advertising methods to securing for itself wealth where it lies in abundance, the worker who is thrown from the production of natural physical and mental necessities is faced with the task of readjusting himself to society. For, according to our way of living, it is only by utilizing the supply of man-hours which he has to offer that the worker can obtain the necessary claims to wealth to enable him to live. And since the standing market for man-hours was not expanded during the decade of the twenties by a reduction in the workday, the worker was forced to carry his excess supply to new markets. He could either:

(1) Create on his own account a demand for his labor energy: He sets up his "hot-dog" stand, buys a taxi, bootlegs, sets up some servicing specialty, or ticket agency, starts a luxury magazine, invents a tom-thumb golf course; or he could:

(2) Wait until capital had created a new "want", had launched enough advertising pressure to squeeze a fresh demand from the market to absorb his energy: He sells Listerine, makes radios, becomes a doorman or a waiter, or thinks up streamline designs for 1929 LaSalles; he can also realize on a demand springing from one originally created by capital and popularized by advertising: He starts a magazine called "Radio", "Motor", or "Vitamin Age."

If only the economic man had that constantly irritating itch for consumption attributed to him by classic economists and good Republicans, all might be well. But he has not. The new goods are less urgently craved by people with claims to wealth; a new obstacle is set up in the making of transactions. An inherent sluggishness clogs the flow of money, which no longer runs spontaneously enough from the higher income groups into active consuming power, neither directly through the purchase of consumer's goods or indirectly through the purchase of plant, new equipment, raw materials, and labor with wage payments.

This is of tremendous importance in any study of unemployment. Dahlberg sums up the immediate issue: "Men displaced by machinery today can be reemployed only when an appetite for new goods has first been created. This results in a continuous lag in the demand for labor on the supply of it, a lag which permanently undermines the bargaining power of workers. The growth of such a situation we objectively observe in low wages and unemployment among the very people who yearn to pour out more money into the patronage of American business. * * *."

* * * * * * *

Post-war industrial methods, not aware of their implication, introduced a condition in which there was a chronic scarcity of jobs and opportunity as opposed to an ever-increasing labor surplus that of necessity was forced into relatively wasteful enterprise or into providing for itself through the haunting insecurity of odd jobs. The promise America came to offer her wage earners in the latter twenties was slightly increased wages for those still allowed to work, a rapidly diminishing call for work, and increasing unemployment. Insecurity and fear cannot be graphed.[20] But that line charted would show an accelerating upward curve during the years under consideration. For another product of new era American industrial prosperity, not quoted on the stock exchange in spite of its heavy increase, was the burden on all charity organizations. The added expenditures leaped far ahead of those that might have been accounted for by population increase. Well before the flood of unemployment broke in 1929 charity was swamped in its effort to continue make-shift wage payments to the industrial cast-offs.

For the first time in 1928 the New York A.I.C.P. closed its annual statement with a deficit and was forced to raise an extra $55,000 for relief purposes. By September 1 of the same year the Prudential Association of St. Louis had used 94 percent of its funds allotted for food, rent, and clothing. And so the reports run from city to city. The textile regions about Philadelphia dated their depression from 1926, and malnutrition, lack of clothing, and general poverty were rampant in Pennsylvania mining areas in 1927. Wendell F. Johnson, after a study of the increase in sickness, desertion, alcoholism, and imprisonment for bootlegging, had this to report in 1928: "It is unquestionably true that the family agency's entire load is influenced by the problem of unemployment, to a greater degree, perhaps, than by any other social problem." On June 28, 1929, Mrs. Worcester made these remarks at the National Conference of Social Work in San Francisco: "This myth of prosperity if believed will lead to inevitable catastrophe. American prosperity is for only 24 percent of the people, and this percentage owns all the wealth of the country * * *. In the time this excess has been accumulating, public charities have increased their expenditures 132 percent * * *."

The situation in fact could not better be summed up than in the words of the same President Simmons whom I have quoted before. With characteristic insight into the roots of economic problems: "Capital in this country has been generated faster than it is needed * * * with the result that American loans", he proceeds, "could be made without harming our own industrial and commercial growth * * *. The United States today actually has more available capital than it knows what to do with * * *."

Had President Simmons known his Marx his statements might not have assumed the same cockiness. For, more than half a century before, this German follower of Hegel had predicted just such a situation's arising, and it was not one to be attended with rejoicing on the part of those who had brought it about: "Along with the constantly diminishing number of magnates of capital, who usurp and monopolize all the advantages of this process of transformation, grows the mass misery, oppression, slavery, degredation, exploitation * * *. The monopoly of capital becomes a fetter upon the whole mode of production which has sprung up and flourished along with it and under it. Centralization of the means of production and socialization of labor at last reach a point where they become incompatible with their capitalist integument. * * * The expropriators are expropriated."

Let's look at some of those who might have had suggestions as to what should be done with this capital surplus.

B. THE FORCED OVERFLOW—UNEMPLOYMENT

Early in 1929 the Brookings Institute conducted a survey intended to answer a few of the questions raised by rumors of an increasing army of the unemployed. At that time of peak prosperity estimates ran vaguely from 2,000,000 all the way up to 6,000,000. At that time of peak prosperity it was again felt in other quarters that new industries, new service jobs, and the increasing number of those in professions amply provided for the industrial overflow. Obviously no one knew very much. It was this that inspired the Brookings Institute to research.

Groups of workers from Baltimore, Chicago, and Worcester were selected for study. They represented a large number of varied skills and trades. Each of the 754 workers interviewed was certified by his former employer to have been dismissed for neither inefficiency nor insubordination. It was necessary that internal rearrangements within the plant should have involved an enforced unemployment.

Among the industrial groups represented were both heavy and light manufacturing, textile manufacturing, wholesale distribution, consumption industries, electrical-products manufacturing, piano and furniture manufacturing, automobile sales and service, wearing-apparel manufacturing, printing and publishing, and various retail and professional services. It was a fairly representative cross-section. All workers had been dismissed in 1928.

When interviewed 45.5 percent were still without work. Of these some 29 percent had been jobless for over 11 months. Of those who finally had found jobs when interviewed 56.3 percent had been out of work for over 3 months; 23.9 percent had been idle for over 6 months. Of the total group only 6 percent succeeded in finding reemployment within a month. Of the total group more than one third had to support the burden of unemployment for over 6 months. Of the total group less than 10 percent resecured their old jobs.

What were the new jobs, and how did they pay?

Only 45.9 percent were able to secure jobs bearing any relationship to their former skill:

"Trained cutters with years of experience in clothing factories had become gasoline-station attendants, watchmen in warehouses, timekeepers in steel plants, and clerks in meat markets. An assistant foreman in a wire mill was driving a truck; a rotary-press operator was pressing clothes in a tailor shop; a machinist, formerly in an envelope factory, was selling hosiery for a mail-order house; and a lathe operator was running a mixer in a cement brick plant. One licensed stationary engineer ultimately found a job as a caretaker in a public park; an operator of a welding machine became a farm hand; and an experienced spinner from a worsted-yarn mill took on the job of radio repairman. A skilled German woodworker, who for many years had been employed in a piano factory, was mixing salves for a drug manufacturer at $20 a week. Many skilled clothing workers had opened cleaning and pressing establishments of their own. Seven of the men had taken up bootlegging * * *"

In short, 48 percent of those who finally secured steady jobs did so at the cost of a sharp decrease in wages. Only 18 percent bettered themselves financially by the change.[21]

During the transition period many eked out their small savings with odd jobs, cleaning automobiles, roadbuilding, distributing circulars, and so on. In 10 percent of the cases the wife went to work. Some rented rooms to outside boarders. 20 percent, when interviewed, had been forced back on to charity. How large a percentage were eventually forced on to charity is not known. In every case the loss of a job meant drastic cuts in food and other living expenses, and in general the evaporation of what long years of careful saving had laid in reserve. In all, the new industries to which had been attributed such amazing powers of absorption employed 15 percent of those surveyed. And last but not least it was found that relatively fewer of those over 45 were able to secure new employment of any kind; those that had, as a group, averaged a longer period between jobs than the younger men. This then, the shrinking age limit for employment, was another contribution of American industry to increasing insecurity.

Hear the wives of Middletown on the subject:

(Husband, a pattern maker, aged 40) "He is 40 and in about 10 years now will be on the shelf. A pattern maker really isn't much wanted after 45. They always put in the young men. What will we do? Well, that is just what I don't know. We are not saving a penny, but we are saving our boys * * *"

(Husband, a molder, aged 51) "He often wonders what he'll do when he gets a little older. He hopes and prays they'll get the State old-age pension through pretty soon * * *"

And so it goes. The gloom of a winter twilight ahead and the chill of futility even in 1928 teaching the 5,000,000 over 65 in the United States, a fraction of whom have savings, the rest dependent on children, relatives, or charity, that the longer life made possible by science is hardly worth living. The speed-up years have made the attainment of an independent and self-respecting old age more difficult in the United States than in any other country in the civilized world. It must be remembered, in discussing relative standards of living, that there is not an important nation of Europe today without its old-age pension system, that from the later years of the nineteenth century it has universally been accepted as one of the natural obligations of the State. But 25 States now provide old-age pensions. The Federal Government recognizes no obligation.

To return to the jobless. Just what could 1 of the 2,000,000 or more unemployed in the year 1928 do about his own case? Just how much could self-reliance, a sense of economic independence help him out? Take a man 35 years old. He is in good physical condition. He has skill and training acquired from a working-lifetime's acquaintance with his job. All his life he has worked in a machine shop. Suddenly he is given a week's notice. New methods are to be introduced. He will be one of 250 to be dismissed. The company is retaining 30 men to do their work.

His ability he wants, if he can, to preserve. It is the fruit of his own life's experience, a grown part of him. It is a part of the very concept of self-reliance that he should not accept the first ditch-digger's job to come his way. He studies the want ads every night. Every morning he is up between 5 and 6 to be at the factory gates before the crowd. Interviews at factory gates begin at 8. By 9 or 10 he has been told to come back again tomorrow. So it is too late to try elsewhere that day. That day has to be killed somehow. A man does not seek cultural enlightenment with economic insecurity sifting away underfoot. The day is just plain killed.

He may wonder about chances in another town. But there is no way of obtaining accurate information. Once upon a time outside employers ran want ads in the local papers. But local manufacturers have decided that this practice is apt to be dangerous. It is [20] Out of 8,515,237 industrial insurance policies terminated during the highly prosperous year of 1928, only 9.4 percent matured normally. The total loss accruing to wage earners through lapsed, surrendered, or expired policies amounted to $1,988,911,000. See p. 126, Epstein, Security A Challenge to America.

[21] Isador Lubin, The Absorption of the Unemployed by American Industry.

of high importance that the supply of skilled labor be kept plentiful at home. Therefore, not only have outside ads been suppressed, but the move has also been coupled with a propaganda campaign of false optimism designed to keep local hopes running high during spells of unemployment.

He tries a free State employment agency. But it handles nothing in his line of work. The free employment agencies have fallen into a general decay. Calls for gangs of unskilled labor are about all they get or deserve. Employers prefer to do their own picking at the gate.

With resources dwindling away he decides to gamble on one of the fee-charging private agencies. The one he picks happens to have been honest. It merely reports nothing doing. But in applying to one at all he was running the following risks (practices common to the private agencies):

(1) Of having from five to ten dollars extorted from him for the privilege of watching an elaborate pantomine staged in his behalf; letters are often sent off to persons in no position to offer jobs. The payment, however, must be in advance, and there is no means of checking the sincerity of the activity it appears to have aroused. And often, should a job turn up, he is forced into pledging a large percentage of his first month's pay before he is told where he may report.

(2) Of falling into the hands of an agency in league with local factory foremen with fee-splitting understandings between them: The fee is $10. Half of this goes to the agency supplying the man, half to the foreman supplying the job. Obviously the greater the supply of fee-paying men the less time the job will last. One firm in Buffalo, for example, hired and fired 500 men in 6 weeks, the foreman and agency each making $5.00 a man. In Camden, N.J., one agency supplied one job with 22 men in 60 days. The variations on this theme are endless. Sometimes, when the applicant is penniless, he can be persuaded to pledge his first 2 weeks' pay. Under the fee-splitting arrangement another Camden firm regularly employed men with such pledges for 2 weeks and then dismissed them. The agency would thus receive 1 week's wage for supplying the man, the factory 2 weeks' work, the man nothing.

(3) Of paying a fee on the assurance that a job had been found, and then of finding no job at the establishment to which he had been referred. In this case the employment agency will be truly sorry but will find it impossible to return the fee: service charges. In some cases an appeal to police protection will return the money, but more often agencies will have found it expedient to keep the police on their beat well satisfied. Too violent an attempt to get money back will merely mean the arrest of the job hunter. New York police are quick to suppress such violence.

(4) Of having working conditions in firms and factories deliberately misrepresented to him. The dangers here are far less for a man than for a girl. If the job to which he has been referred should prove dishonest or one involving lower wages than those represented, etc., he need only walk out, save in cases where his traveling expenses have been paid and he is bound either by obligation to his employer to remain, or because he would otherwise be stranded. Girls are not always able just to walk out of apparently innocent jobs once they have been proven otherwise. Mass unemployment is a rapid breeder of prostitutes; sexual attraction is one commodity with a steadily persistent effective demand.

(5) O having to pay greatly stepped-up fees for the privilege of a job when times are hard and he can least afford it. Private agencies fatten off depressions. In their case the laws of supply and demand work with rare beneficence. At times, when jobs are scarce and applicants are many, the job can even be auctioned off to the highest bidder.[22]

[22] A few years ago it was estimated conservatively that there were between 3,000 and 4,000 private fee-charging agencies in the United States. New York City alone boasted some 1,330. Attempts to legislate them out of existence on the part of several of the States were blocked by the Supreme Court. Efficient public agencies and greater precaution in issuing licenses are the only methods of getting at them. During the winter I employed a man to keep in touch with some of the activities of the Sixth Avenue agencies in New York. He not only followed the story through from start to finish of a number of jobs secured through these agencies by keeping in contact with the individual concerned, but also by loitering about in their waiting rooms and observing their methods, and by keeping his ears and eyes open and by pressing conversations, made a general survey as far as possible of this legally protected system of profiteering off human misery and desperation. In addition to the usually recognized abuses listed above he was able to report a number of refinements, for one of the merits of competition is that it keens a business to greater proficiency in its line of trade. It is enough to know, however, that the agencies are of course enjoying a boom-time lift. His estimate that 75 percent of the New York private agencies are dishonest has of course no statistical backing. It reflects merely the general impression gained by one man from random specific observations and a host of cumulative rumors. Their only service is that at present they are the only available clearing houses for the many odd jobs that crop up during a city day. One agency, for example, has a constant demand every morning at 6 a.m. for extra dishwashers needed for the day by restaurants. It makes 25 cents out of each of these $2 jobs.

At any rate our job hunter came safely through his private-agency experience. But how long can he hold out waiting for a job to match his skill? Machinists in tool shops were among the higher paid groups of industrial employees. It was Secretary of Commerce Hoover's boast of December 1927 that the average wage for manufacturing industries had reached $1,280. Granting our man an annual income of approximately $1,500 would place him far above the average, and, allowing for fluctuations in various parts of the country, would reflect generally the wages paid in machine shops in 1928. Since he is average in every way, he must also have a wife and three children to support.

How long then can he hold out on his savings?

He was dismissed in a year when thrift was a virtue more to be praised in our sturdy ancestors than in the living by our best publicists and advertisers. It is only today, when productive facilities are still greater than they were in 1928, that publicists have again come to recognize thrift as an inherent virtue in the American workingman.

Obviously we can only talk in terms of mythical averages. But the following figures give more meaning to an income of $1,500 than it can contain in isolation and unrelated to anything else. Under urban conditions it has been estimated that $1,800 will support a man, wife, and 3 children at a bare subsistence level; to live at a minimum for health and efficiency a similar family would have to aspire to an annual income of $2,100 a year. But even assuming our man had a son old enough to do odd jobs, to keep him within the group of averages, it is unlikely that the family income could have reached that height. In a cross-section investigation of American industrial life conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics under Ethelbert Stewart (since dismissed by Secretary Doak for showing a dangerously nonpolitical respect for the integrity of figures) it was found that 92 percent of the wage-earning families of America—and that means family, not individual, earnings—were below $2,100. We cannot place our average man and his family in an aristocracy of 8 percent.

Unless our man then had denied himself to an extraordinary degree he faces a lay-off with practically no prop of savings to preserve what possessions, what standards of decency, and what normal self-respect demanded he purchase for himself and his family. Nor can the budget estimates quoted above be discarded as reflecting sentimental wish-fulfillment on the part of well-meaning social workers. Those quoted are lower than a number of estimates; infinitely lower than those that take in the potentialities offered by modern living conveniences. They provide for practically no recreational activities, no reading matter beyond a newspaper, and the allowance for food is less than that provided for Federal prisoners in Atlanta, Ga.

Unfortunately living demands do not fluctuate in accordance with factory lay-offs. The job is the one foothold this man has on life. And the claims to wealth received from that kept him in a state of chronic want. The sickness of any member of the family, even when the job is steady, is more than enough to crack one year's budget. Loss of a job, however, means the scrapping of all plans looking into the future.

The main struggle of this man will be to keep out of the ranks of unskilled labor. Once he slips there is no getting back. Therefore, after exhausting every means of finding work suited to his ability, he will quickly be forced into falling back on what odd jobs he can pick up to tide him over. He is trustworthy, so the local butcher, grocer, and baker may allow his bills to run on for a time. But gradually other things slip away. All the several symbols of a slow climb toward respectability and progress, plates, furniture, personal belongings from a watch to his wife's wedding ring, all must gradually slip through the fingers, become food, and be eaten. The home itself cannot last many months of this. Perhaps before the four walls go, however, the inside cracks. To help her husband cling to his economic station, the wife goes to work, and the children go to neighbors.

There is no need to trace the slow drainage further. The direction of the flow is obvious. How long it is to continue depends not on the man, not on his native ability or acquired skill, but on the chance cracking open of his environment. But he has been taught not to believe this. And if he has faith in himself, he bears the burden of shame, too. Other men may go jobless, may lose all they had, but nothing like that can ever really happen to him. Something must turn up. So, borrowing from friends, cutting down drastically on food requirements, on clothing expenditures, letting the house go with all it represents of years of painful saving, moving into cheaper quarters, a slum area condemned 20 years ago, supported by his wife and the odd earnings perhaps of a child, struggling away from the last degrading and humiliating step toward which he is all the time slipping, application to charity, this man watches happen to him, always disbelievingly, what has happened to others. He is the main actor in his own nightmare. And at the end he discovers with a dazingly clear fine shock that he is quite ordinary. The solid world has crumbled beneath his feet, and he is nobody. And if, somehow, sometime, the job he wants should turn up, it is not likely that he will face, hopelessly in debt, the long hard road of saving with the same zest with which he first began it. You cannot start over again all the time. And he has discovered that no native ability or personal ingenuity can save him from playing the role that he has been taught to despise others for playing; even he cannot keep a home together, cannot feed his own children, must rely on his wife, on private charity intended for paupers and cripples.

This is not a pleasant discovery.

The psychological effects of unemployment cannot, as I have suggested, be charted. Not that it would do any good if they were. The men who pay such flowery tributes at banqueting time to the faith, sturdy diligence, thrift, self-reliance, and patient loyalty [33] of the American workingman do not suggest by their public chantings that they possess even the not overquick imagination capable of understanding effect until it hits them in the stomach, cause unknown. They reveal themselves incapable even of facing stark reality, let alone the implications of industrial interdependence. Those several men in business who are equal to such understanding, save in isolated instances, are unable to act upon it, for our industrial tempo has been geared to those who are not.

There is much talk of the beautiful sanctity of private property coupled with lofty sniffings at "fumes brewed in the witch's cauldron of Moscow." Yet we are the one Western nation that refuses to take the first precautionary steps toward protecting it from the myriad economic storms that can utterly destroy it in one man's lifetime. Capital investments, to be sure, we have adequately protected against the fluctuations, cyclical and seasonal, of industry. The obsolescence of machinery is guarded against, the depreciation rate being properly regarded as a fixed charge in industrial undertakings. And when capital is temporarily unemployed, if management has been at all efficient, it receives its dole. It is a myth to talk of "earnings" when machines are idle. And no one has as yet suggested that self-reliance and thrift and independence are seriously undermined by these elementary evidences of efficient management: such measures are merely a recognition of the fact that security of income is the first essential in the planning of any life.

One wonders whether or not beneath the hazy words of high oratory it is really assumed that the need for food, shelter, clothing, and the maintenance of common decency of the American wage earner fluctuates in strict accordance with the need for his work. Such an assumption is not, of course, seriously made, yet the echoings of ancient faith persist: "If the individual surrenders his own initiative and responsibilites, he is surrendering his own freedom and his own liberty. Ours must be a country of such stability and security as cannot fail to carry forward and enlarge among all the people that abundant life of material and spiritual opportunity which it has represented among all nations since its beginning."

Of course, such words do paint glowingly a faith we believe we cherish more than other nations of the earth. The fight—and its emotional vigor cannot be jauntily ignored—is to preserve the wage earner from being treated like a machine. Stripped of warm honey, however, such words reveal a mind so warpedly blind that even the most terrible physical torture in the physical world is not able to disturb the roseate picture superimposed from the psychical world. Such words do not show a willfully cruel man, merely one witlessly stubborn.

The confusion arises from a refusal to recognize that all men share certain machinelike qualities; fuel must be burned before energy can be directed toward any task. And the very nature of our economic system, dependent as it is upon a specialization of human labor as well as of whole communities to production that is worthless save as it is related to the whole, enforces the utter material reliance of one man upon another for the right to life itself. It would be a strange spirit of individualism that could be destroyed by a sane admission of this fact. Yet the fight has gone on over a period of years to save the spiritual strength of the American wage earner while his body is invited to rot into silly weakness, and those of his children into distorted growth. The soul, beautiful in spite of physical ugliness, rich in spite of physical poverty, clean in spite of physical filth, independent in spite of physical dependence, has always been a myth of puritan fabrication.

Unemployment and poverty would be impossible today were there mere physical forces to contend with. That fact cannot be overemphasized. The stink of a thousand slums is more than a mere physical peculiarity of our civilization.

* * * * * * *

We may wonder at the depth of our present depression. But it is not wondrous. A little over 10 years ago, after investigation, discussion, and recommendations, the Government turned over the solution of unemployment to private industry. Private industry was profoundly touched by the recommendations and contributed some further ones on its own account couched in even more morally uplifting phraseology. The discovery that business cycles were things of the past relieved it from the burden of voluntary action. It still retained its right to destroy the property, crack up the lives and bodies of American citizens according to private whim and business hunch. It still retained its right to make public charges of its employees on the slightest provocation. A mere handful of industrial concerns took the first preliminary steps toward assuring a minimum of security to those in their employ. The classic examples of those who have sought to pluck order out of chaos are the Hill Bros. Co., preservers of dates; the Columbia Conserve Co., food canners; the Endicott Johnson Corporation, shoe manufacturers; the Dennison Manufacturing Co., paper novelty producers; the Proctor and Gamble Corporation, makers of Ivory soap; the S. C. Johnson Co. of Racine, Wis., varnish manufacturers; the Knox Hat Co.; and, last but not least, the General Electric Co. In each case efforts toward stabilization naturally have brought definite and tangible financial rewards to the company as well as a sense of security into the lives of the workers. And in each case this has been reflected in the life and appearance of the community surrounding the area so affected. In the December 1932 Report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, after 3 years of depression, is a statement issued by each of the firms listed above as well as by the few others that have taken similar steps, reaffirming their confidence in the regularization schemes adopted during boom years; those that have in addition covered their employees with unemployment insurance show equal enthusiasm. But their welfare projects are on shaky financial legs.

And in spite of these firms, today, more than 10 years after the President's investigation committee met and conferred on the problems of unemployment, less than 1 percent of the workers in the United States are guarded against fluctuations in employment, and many of these are under trade-union protection. There is nothing wondrous in the depth of our present depression. The lives and fortunes, bodily as well as spiritual, of the vast majority of our people are still at the mercy of a chaotic and disorganized industry, and for this privilege they pay, physically and mentally.

What, for example, can the people of a town like Toledo know of the stability and security Mr. Hoover prized so highly? It is a town dominated by one industry, the Willys-Overland Motor Car Co. The 200 other small local industries float on the tides of good times and bad out at the plant. So, too, do the fortunes of every independent storekeeper in the vicinity. At the time, not so long ago, when it looked as though the Willys-Overland could look forward to putting the camel among the technologically unemployed in Central Asia as well as expect heavy sales in darkest Africa, radio and newspaper advertising campaigns sucked the surrounding countryside dry, and labor hustled to Toledo. This story is duplicated throughout the Middle West.

Automobile factories do not like to get caught short-handed; things are always apt to open up. And so as orders come and orders go men are hired and fired. The promised weekly pay check of $38.50 that sounded so fine coming in over the radio does not lump so large as it trickles in over the year. It averages for the lucky from $1,300 to $1,400 annually in normal times on the hired-this-week, fired-that-week system. The skilled jobs are apt, of course, to be steadier and average higher. But the community itself is actually no more than a vast reserve labor pool created by oily advertising methods for the benefit of the industry that brought it into being. In dull times the pool goes stagnant. Local business enterprises fail; banks sway. False promises and organized newspaper propaganda keep hopes up and the labor market glutted. That is the industry's sole concern. Charity and groceries on increasingly inelastic credit pay its wages, until local funds are exhausted and grocers ruined. The community lives off tomorrow. Seven thousand five hundred men to be taken on at the plant in the morning reports a local paper. The morning comes and five are hired.

In March 1929 there were 28,000 on the Willys-Overland pay roll. In November 1929 there were 4,000. Between October 1929 and December 1930, the number of new cases at the Family Relief, run by the Social Service Federation in that town, multiplied itself by 5.[34]

"We have learned", said President Miller of the company, "that maximum production does not pay."

That is indeed consoling. But it still remains a matter of some conjecture as to how much longer the Nation can afford to regard itself as a free experimental laboratory for the self-education of its industrialists. The job is still the navel string of the Nation's consuming power.

* * * * * * *

The results of industry's costly experiments at putting its own house in order are summed up by Mrs. Worcester writing in the Survey in 1928: "We look again at the United States, the twentieth century Crœsus: wealth, vast quantities of wealth, enough to abolish poverty throughout the land; 90 percent of this wealth owned by 13 percent of the people; 77 percent of the people owning no smallest portion of it; 50 percent of the national income going to capital; nowhere in all the land any evidence of a single industrial group in which the annual income of a wage earner is sufficient to enable him to support a wife and three small [33] "There have been a number of violent manifestations resulting in deaths, injuries and destruction of property. An undercurrent of resentment, disaffection, and threats is becoming more prevalent, and it is believed that lack of program and leadership among the unemployed has prevented more serious outbreaks . . ." H. L. Lurie, statement before Senate Committee on Manufactures, Jan. 3, 1933. It might also be added that outbreaks, particularly in automobile regions of the Middle West, during depression years have not received publicity.

[34] The above from a report covering an investigation of Toledo by Beulah Amidon published in the Survey.

children in accordance with the low standard set by a group of employers; the average wage for the country as a whole, $1,280 a year, dooming the worker who is the father of dependent children to chronic want, forcing him into an acceptance of public or private charity in the event of any of the ordinary disasters of life—unemployment, sickness, death; and these same charities quadrupling, quintupling their budgets in a single decade. This is the richest nation on earth; this our amazing prosperity!"

That it was an amazing prosperity is not even questioned in the circles of highest finance. Our friend, President Simmons, seems always able to contribute the right word at the right time. And furthermore, in seeking the germs of unemployment, his utterances shed continual light on the long sequence of cause and effect: "Our great national prosperity", he said not long after Mrs. Worcester had written, "* * * is not yet thoroughly understood * * *. Few, if any of us, have as yet satisfactorily analyzed its basic causes * * *. That it has been accompanied by an enormous expansion in our facilities for production, and that the financing of these expanded productive facilities has been largely accompanied by increased issues of securities, seems self-evident. With the larger perspective", he goes on, "which future years will provide, we may well come to realize that there is an integral relationship between national prosperity and activity in the security business, and that to artificially hamper or interfere with the latter is inevitably to imperil the former * * *."

Such words clearly suggest, though they do not prove, that it is only in wonderland that Cheshire cats can grin long without body. It is for that reason that one is turned toward a more precise examination of the body as a whole.

C. UNEMPLOYMENT AND MARKET OUTLETS

"In this and every other highly developed industrial country, domestic consumption is now the key to every vital economic question. It has become the basis of industrial stability, the source of business profits, the measure of standards of living, the ultimate test of social progress. It sets the limits of profiable capital investment and industrial expansion, establishes the value of corporation securities, and must determine the fiscal policies of government."[25]

All that follows is to be considered in the light of our present policy of wage deflation—in order to determine whether or not our general failure to realize what aided in precipitating the depression has not increasingly led to its further depth and intensity.

Briefly these facts have been noted:

(1) Our combined export and tariff policy, while contributing to the general depression of world prices, has been matched by every other manufacturing country in an effort to maintain financial stability at home. Our exports, during the entire era, were a comparatively negligible factor compared to our total production. Their decline, since never were they more than 7 percent to 8 percent of our domestic market, does not materially affect what may or may not be done at home. In 1929 they amounted to only $7,490,000,000.

(2) This is of tremendous significance. It means that the burden of supporting from 90 to 95 percent of a rapidly expanding wealth of production fell on the domestic market, where insatiable desire now can only be expressed in terms of a correspondingly rapid expansion in wage, salary, or other income return.

(3) The speed-up and shift in industrial method and field resulted in a continuous transitional flow of labor. The unspontaneity of new demand resulted in a continuously increasing lag between job and job. New employment was increasingly characterized not only by a reduction in wage return but by the nonessentiality and precariousness of the job found.

(4) The more rapidly expanding new industries—automobiles, radios, and electrical appliances, as well as building—were marked by one characteristic: durability, indicating that once an absorption point was reached the turnover demand could only artificially be stimulated by advertising pressure, and new-model frills—their natural exhaustion rate, as compared to clothing and food, was slow. Slack was inevitable as long as the consumer's market was not allowed to expand in accordance with productive capacity.

(6) Finally the consequences: A surplus of capital hunting aimlessly for profitable investment—an enormous amount of construction of producers', as opposed to consumers', goods—a so-called "saving" through investment that was far more disastrous and riotous than any amount of spending—a burden of spending, because of capital savings, falling directly on a relatively underpaid consuming power that mass-credit facilities could only temporarily handle.

Therefore for the next few pages I want to put aside all thought of the social justice of the inequitable distribution of wealth and merely inquire into its economic soundness as it manifested itself during the years of prosperity. Political oratory only obscures the issue. But if it is not economically justified, then steps toward a redistribution should be taken to preserve even the rich themselves. After all, savings as represented by dead capital equipment; machinery, however efficient; factory plant, however expensively constructed; warehouses, however crammed, are useless. Only money in the pockets of the multitudinous army of consumers, as far as a business man is concerned, can touch this dead matter with the spark of life. Money—consumer's purchasing power—is the kiss to waken this sleeping beauty.

* * * * * * *

Recipients of wages and salaries are of dominant importance in our domestic market. Those that receive less than $3,000 a year account for over 67 percent of total purchases. And income groups below the $5,000 line purchase 78 percent of the total. In 1929 they consumed $65,143,000,000 worth of goods and services out of a total $89,000,000,000 of individual consumption. The group represented by the majority of wage earners, teachers, bank and store clerks, telephone operators, stenographers, and so on—receiving incomes of between $1,000 and $2,000—while it accounts for more than 36 percent of total domestic expenditures, spends more than any other income group for its food, clothing, housing, and what other essential and few luxury services it can command.

It is evident from this division of consuming groups where attention must be focused for any consideration of the basic health of the American economic system during its era of great prosperity. For it is equally evident that the pressure to support an increasing volume of supply must be least bearable where demand is allowed least leeway; that is, a major percentage of the expenditures of the lower-income groups, of necessity, in order that bodies may live, must go into food, clothing, and shelter.

The failure to grasp this fundamental principle of economic A B C's on the part of those responsible for the wage and salary policies of the United States during its boom period fill their high chantings, in retrospect, with a moon-struck hollowness. On close examination the so-called "economy of high wages" does not look impressive.

Look at manufacturing wages, for example, comparing them at the same time with the value produced. In 1923 total wages paid in manufacturing industries amounted to $11,009,000,000. In that same year the value of the product was $60,556,000,000. The total value continued to increase: 1925, $62,714,000,000; in 1927 it had become $62,718,000,000; and in 1929 it jumped rapidly to an all-time high of $70,420,000,000.[26]

Bear continually in mind that, save for a negligible percentage, American manufacturers depend on the domestic market. Now, how did wages fare during this period? While the value of products climbed over $2,000,000,000 between 1923 and 1925, total wages payments actually decreased by over $270,000,000. From then on they picked up slowly, reaching in 1929, $11,684,000—a total increase over the 6-year period of $675,000,000 to match an increase in value of goods produced of $9,864,000,000.[27]

Who was to absorb this additional $10,000,000,000 worth of goods? Evidently not those who had produced it. For while the physical production of goods had rocketed, the total real pay roll of those engaged in manufacturing not even for one brief high spot in 1929, in spite of the dollars-and-cents appearance, amounted to what it had been in 1923 when physical production was far less. It must not be forgotten that it is not wage rates, but volume of wage payments in relation to volume of goods produced, that is of importance.[28]

Who then was to absorb it? The farmers? That is a silly question. Wage earners outside of industry? The total wages received by all wage earners in the United States declined from 1927 on, in spite of the slight increase shown by those in manufacturing. Nor is the total increase in salary payments any more reassuring.

NOTE.—Wil. King, the National Income and Its Purchasing Power, quoted by Epstein.

[25] Virgil Jordan, Bulletin of the Taylor Society, October 1932.

[26] Statistical Abstract of the United States.

[27] The trend is summed by Mills in Economic Tendencies: "For manufacturing labor the excess of rewards was steadily reduced (as a result of declining labor costs) after 1921, and was wiped out by 1929, but for ownership and management an axcess of rewards over apparent physical contribution * * * persisted through 1929."

[28] Average annual earnings of wageworkers taking account of actual unemployment.

Again, throughout this period, it was generally assumed that though the purchasing power of factory workers was not keeping pace with the volume of goods produced, that wages and salaries coming from the new service industries, trade, public utilities, and so on made up the deficiency. These new services thus are the bulwark of those who argue away the need for concern over increasing technological and efficiency unemployment. I quote from Emmet H. Welch, research associate in the University of Pennsylvania: "To the extent that these nonmanufacturing industries have afforded a means of investing additional capital and employing labor, they have acted as a temporary offset to deficient consumers' purchasing power distributed in manufacturing industries. However, the services created by these nonmanufacturing industries have to be paid for out of consumers' purchasing power (viz, advertising, etc.) and contribute further to the discrepancy between consumers' purchasing power and production unless all of the purchasing power distributed in the production of their services is used for consumption purchases."

There is no escapting the consequences of our mass-production methods. Wage and salary earners are the masses. They must receive purchasing power adequate to absorb the goods produced. It is obvious, however, from this brief survey of the period, that an obsolete and misapplied sense of self-interest led industrialists and financiers, as a group, directly to suicide.

* * * * * * *

Evidence in another direction that they failed to face the implications of new production technique comes from the rapid rise of mass credit facilities. In 1927 it is estimated that 60 percent of all automobiles, 80 percent of household equipment—from pianos and radios to vacuum cleaners and washing machines—75 percent of tractors, 10 percent of all farm machinery, and 25 percent of jewelry was sold on the installment plan. Mass credit, it is estimated conservatively, did business at the annual rate of $2,482,000,000. Credit sources ranged all the way from loan sharks charging annual interest rates up to 480 percent and doing a business of $750,000,000 annually to remedial loan societies of semicharitable characteristics. This is one outcome of the new era almost utterly ignored by economists, and emphasizes eloquently the inadequacy of wage scales based on former production technique. There is no call to go farther into the matter here. But it is evident that those in control of industry were far more concerned over what could immediately be plucked from it in the form of profit than in either its basic financial health or in the steady maintenance of more moderate profits over a longer period of time. There would be no call even to stress a point so obvious were it not for the mass of ballyhoo summoned up to obscure the issue. And it is furthermore futile to look for remedies in mere trade agreements.

Let us look into the earnings of capital for a moment.

In 1922 the total of dividends paid by all corporations was $930,684,000. By 1929 this figure had ripened to the lush total of $3,478,000,000. Bondholders and banks were no less well off; all corporations paid an interest in 1922 of $2,469,000,000—and in 1929 of $7,588,000,000. The "Golden Era", from this high pinnacle of finance, is indeed well named. Mr. Frey, writing in the American Federationist for July 1931, points out further that during this same period Federal Reserve banks had increased their capital from $1,900,000,000 to $2,700,000,000, their surplus from $1,600,000,000 to $2,800,000,000, dividends paid on their stock from $246,000,000 to $408,000,000.

In short, this period showed tremendously increased production, a declining number of wage earners, a declining pay roll, and a tremendous glut of surplus capital that could do little more than further increase production, eventually force down prices, intensify the always present fear of economic insecurity, until it had gnawed away its very foundations and plunged millions into a fantastic starvation amid the very strongholds of its own saved surplus—crammed warehouses, idle plants, and funds crying for profitable investment.

Mr. Frey concludes, and he is right as far as he goes: "The outstanding facts of the so-called "period of prosperity" from 1922 to the end of 1929, present a depressing picture of economically unsound and destructive business policies. There is little if anything in the basic statistics to encourage or create confidence in the future. It is apparent that during this period the American wage earner was considered almost wholly as a producer of wealth and that he was disregarded as consumer of the Nation's products * * *. It is the breakdown of this home market which has stilled the wheels of industry and created the condition of unemployment which contains such grave elements of danger. We will not refer to the many alleged reasons given for the depression. Some of them are absurd, a few partly true, but all of them carefully avoid reference to the principal cause—the payment of wages so completely out of economic relationship with the wealth being created that these wages actually forced continually lessened sales of manufactured goods in the United States, the one great market for American products * * *."

"Poverty and insecurity in a world of abundant resources and of gigantic powers which have been effectively matured and put in harness for human service is a monstrous stupidity. It is not a deprivation imposed upon us by any lack of national opportunity, but a failure of human intelligence. Given the resources, their distribution is not a question of natural limits or inevitable laws from which we cannot escape, but of ordinary, sensible human arrangements * * *. It is the conduit, the system of distribution, which is the thing alterable at human will * * *. It is our production capacity alone which sets any limit of natural law to our possible standards of living * * *. It is the aqueduct which must be made capable of carrying the available supplies, and not the supplies which must be restricted to the carrying capacity of an inefficient aqueduct * * *," writes Fred Henderson in his Economic Consequences of Power Production.

How far from this conception of an economic system capable of producing an abundant surplus were our industrial and financial prophets as they plunged into depression we have observed. Rather than sharing with industry the new profits of increased production at lower unit cost, ownership channeled the wealth back to itself. In the meantime every known appeal to pride, emotion, and patriotism itself was made to wage earners to spend immediately their trickle of earnings buying goods to support American prosperity: Buy—buy—buy—even if you must borrow. The whole high-pressure drive toward production was accompanied by nothing approaching stability or sanity. It was accompanied only by intensified pressure on the majority of the middle class, including the professional groups, and on the wage earner, that served to turn life into an increasingly chaotic struggle to maintain not only appearance but economic station itself in life.

Added to this was the campaign conducted by the Treasury Department to reduce taxation on great wealth. The excess profits tax was repealed. Income taxes on the higher brackets were reduced.[29] All sane efforts toward stabilization were killed. The report of the coal committee was dumped. Agriculture was ignored. And the President boosted the stock market.

Thus normalcy, rising to fever heat, expired. Now comes the spectacle of watching the wise men—having once scratched out their eyes by jumping into the bramble bush—flounder again, deeper and deeper, with profound faith in Mother Goose.

The following parallel columns of figures speak for themselves. Just as a badly outrun purchasing power helped plunge us into depression, so a ruthlessly slashed purchasing power has swallowed us into its depths. The first column shows relative amounts paid out in wages by manufacturing establishments reporting to the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. The second column shows total interest and dividend payments by American corporations by years, according to the Standard Statistics Co. Both columns start with the base year 1926=100.

The tremendous drop in wages, besides reflecting unemployment, is the result of part-time work and reduced hourly rates. From these figures it is clear that while wages have been slashed almost 70 percent below their 1926 level, dividend and interest payments, in spite of the decline since 1931, are still approximately 60 percent above their 1926 level. This reflects the careful building up of reserves.

It is insane that the most vital part of the consumers' market to industry, for its own self-preservation, is not similarly protected.

Do "natural economic forces" affect only wage earners? They have been overcome so far as investors are concerned.

In the year 1932 all wage earners received approximately $30,000,000,000 less in wages than in 1926. In the year 1932 dividends and interest paid approximately $7,000,000,000 more than in 1926. There is only one conclusion to be drawn. Unemployed capital is living off a dole supplied by the wage earners of the country.

[29] These figures throw interesting comparative light on our taxation policy. They are compiled by the Chase National Bank:

These figures reveal the essential futility of talking of and probing into the causes of unemployment. Until unemployment of men is considered as great an industrial hazard as the unemployment of capital investment and reserves built accordingly, unemployment causes and cures remain a rather academic discussion. It is with this warning that I proceed to just such a discussion.

III

UNEMPLOYMENT, STEPS TOWARD A CURE

A. UNEMPLOYMENT IN AMERICA

All figures on unemployment in this country, owing to our almost complete indifference to it up to now, are inaccurate—estimates only. In some cases they reflect at best the political prejudice of the compiler. The most careful studies show, however, that the relative volume of unemployment in the United States has consistently been on the average nearly twice that of pre-war Britain; that during our recent boom period the average for four major groups of industry has consistently increased; and that our total post-war average, in spite of the new and rapidly expanding industries that developed during that time, was only slightly under England's during her decade of greatest distress.

There are several immediate reasons, besides carelessness, why we should suffer so in comparison with England:

(1) Our climates change with greater intensity. Winters are really cold. Summers are really hot. In England they only talk about heat waves. They never have them. This reacts violently on producers of food. We change our diet with the weather. That is a refinement of civilization England has most certainly never had urged upon her. Meats and carbohydrates turn to fruits, vegetables, cold drinks, and ice cream. We have our own and varied winter sports. We tend to buy our automobiles at one time in the year. Building trades, though with increasing unnecessity, suffer tremendous seasonal fluctuations. And all this is in turn reflected back on to producers of raw products, capital equipment, and carriers.

(2) Style rules more mightily in the United States than in England. That clothes can be made to overleap class stratifications imposed by income is meat for the advertisers. Fads come and go with greater violence. And manufacturers, rather than attempting to restrain, urge on the tendencies outlined. New models, frills, elaborations, and artificially induced obsolescence clutter the markets.

(3) There are constant geographical shifts. New cities and districts explode into sudden building booms showering all corners of the land with the wreckage of blasted expectancy. Industries are given to wandering about in a vague sort of way. First we build too many cotton mills in New England; then we move down South and build too many more, all the time with a high medicine chanting: "It is highly important," says President Simmons of the New York Stock Exchange in Atlanta in 1929, "to such a new but rapidly evolving section of our country as this, that no impediment be placed in the way of the long-term security financing which the great economic opportunities here so manifestly justify and deserve * * *." And men talk of vision and the unfulfilled dreams of the new South, while New England turns into a hollow shell sucked dry.

Some idea of the roving nature of our industries is contained in the table below. They squat nesting, disgorge their spewings over the countryside, and, having lain in their own filth for a time, hatched their eggs, move on, leaving in their train strange grey ghost towns and bewildered men. They are birds that seldom return

(4) A comparison of the respective tempos of English and American industries suggests another reason why we have a larger percentage of men struggling to keep up with ever-receding jobs in spite of industrial expansion. From 1907 to 1924, for example, England's output per capita increased 4 percent. Ours rose 45 percent. England's total production increased by 23 percent, while ours increased by 80 percent. Our business men have never been cured of a certain inherent optimism, the reasons for which I have attempted to probe, that leads invariably to an overbalancing of industry. The speed of output is increased. The unit cost of output is decreased. Wage rates do not keep pace. Markets are glutted. Men are expelled. And another transitional stage sets in. The assumption is that initial sales are an indication of all-time heaven.

These trends have been gathered up quickly for examination in a figure-gathering dash through the New Era. The conclusion is one that may be assumed. Unemployment is a luxury our business prophets cannot continue much longer to afford. Mr. Hoover tried desperately to eliminate other monstrous wastes in industry for a decade. Yet no constructive steps, save in isolated instances, in spite of constant conferences, have been taken toward eliminating a waste that in normal years averaged $4,200,000,000 in lost purchasing power. Over $2,000,000,000 was lost annually through idle capital. And interest rates, depreciation, taxes, and obsolescence on this dead plant matter at a conservative estimate runs over $250,000,000.[40]

At the present moment over $30,000,000,000 is being lost because wage earners are not allowed to return that amount in purchasing power alone.

Indeed, as one follows the trail of the dizzy pioneers of the New Era frantically driving toward the ever-receding limits of a lost dream frontier, one conjures dreams of one's own—new covered-wagon expeditions, new lands to explore, endless regions for the bold pioneer. The trail leads directly across financial deserts to undeveloped regions, vast, untouched, and hungering—the consuming power and security and leisure of our own people. That is the new frontier.

B. MAIN CAUSES—THE CLOGS

It would, I believe, greatly clarify steps recommended toward a cure for unemployment if its main causes were isolated from the background sketched, and the recommendations allowed to evolve coherently, units bearing an inherent relationship to one another. For this reason I have broken unemployment down under three main headings. The unemployment listed under the first two, springing from the growth and environment of the system itself, will, regardless of glibly assumed basic economic health, always be a constant factor, always an irritant tending to precipitate the sickness of the system as a whole and the vomiting forth of the third and viciously destructive form of unemployment, cyclical. To isolate any one of the forms of unemployment is in itself an artificiality undertaken only for convenience; it is not meant to imply that unemployment is a curse imposed upon and not a consequence born of our economic system—reared to a menacing giant where business success must feed on want; where to satisfy want is to kill business.

The realities of a capitalistic background must not be forgotten, for they for a time must determine the logic of cure. Mere isolated reason, which, wandering in from a world where bread was bread and clothes something to be worn, might ingenuously suggest, seeing on the one hand an infinite amount of work to be done and, on the other, several million men eager to do it: Furnish this army with architects and engineers as generals; let it reconstruct its own and consequently the Nation's wealth; let it give more beautiful and slumless cities, parks, public playgrounds, more adequate highways, more accessible power sources—let it clean away the decay and accumulated filth of a century of messy community living in exchange for the bread, fruit, meat, milk, and vegetables, the shoes and clothing, the abundant building materials that it so earnestly and desperately craves, and that are cluttering your markets and destroying the foundations of your business world; let it enrich the Nation and itself with the products of its own labor, with the native ability of its members, many of whom are talented—or continue as you have for the past 3 years until you have furnished incontestable evidence that the capitalist system too must pass with the decay and accumulated filth of a century and more of insane community living.

I have grouped the main causes of unemployment as follows:

(1) Dynamic unemployment.—A coined but applicable term. This form of unemployment is the price inevitably paid for a surging economic system. It is inherently rooted in the very nature of capitalism, in the nature of any economy that would retain for itself the privilege of continuous dissatisfaction. It is the direct result of the obsolescence of an outmoded technique—the consequence of all progress. Society profits by it. It follows that society should concern itself over it. Its present ignoring of the whole problem amounts to an implicit withdrawal of the rights of citizenship from those who suffer by it. In its own self-interest it would repay society to bestir itself over this form of unemployment. It is as persistent in boom times as it is in depressed periods. It commonly manifests itself in the following forms:

In general, industrial and business efficiency tend to improve thus forcing out of business less efficient and more marginal units. Men will be unemployed.

Internal improvements within a given thriving industry that come as a result of labor-saving-machine improvements, the introduction of scientific management aimed at the elimination of waste and the cutting down of production costs will increase per capita output. If the industry has already passed through its period of initial expansion, if the field of demand which it supplies has therefore become increasingly inelastic, if it should fail to reduce prices—even if it should reduce prices, and its thousand and one retail distributors should fail to reduce prices—man-hours will be unemployed.

[40] Director and Douglas, the Problem of Unemployment.

Industrial areas built up about natural resources, communities given to their extraction, decay with the exhaustion of the ground. The same applies to agricultural areas. The development of new natural deposits, of more fertile land, hastens the collapse of the old. While the coal-mining regions of Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa are in decay, they are growing in Kentucky, Virginia, and West Virginia. Texas is drawing cotton growers westward to its boll-weevil-less heaven. Men are not only unemployed but stranded as well.

Industries shift their location. Textile mills flow from New England to the cheaper South. Shoe factories walk westward from Massachusetts. Flour-milling centers leave Minneapolis for Buffalo. Chicago is no longer king of the livestock world. How much longer brass will be hauled across a continent to and from the Naugatuck Valley is doubtful. Men will be unemployed—and again stranded in skeleton husks.

New inventions that mean the crowding of fresh industries into established fields of already comparatively inelastic demand bring havoc to those now furnishing the supply. The bulk of consumer's purchasing power is in itself rigidly divided into certain percentages calculated to meet certain physical needs. New industries furnish fresh supply but must feed off the old demand as it exists in terms of dollars in the consumer's pocket. Therefore rayon cannot thrive without textiles in general receiving less of the consumer's dollar constantly set aside for clothing. And even should the dollar supply expand, people would not buy both ice and electric refrigerators, wooden shingles and manufactured roofing material. People tend to buy relatively fewer pianos and phonographs, more radios; less corn and flour, more spinach and tomatoes; less railway mileage, more gasoline and automobiles. Men will be unemployed.

Industries, banks, and retail units merge. There is not only a duplication of many jobs within the new combination—whole office staffs are wiped out—but the new combination will undermine many of the weaker businesses remaining in the same field. Men will be unemployed.

In the above list I have grouped only the normal and often desirable changing elements in a dynamic economic system. To offer an opposition to change and regroupings as many do as the solution of the difficulties involved, to declare a "moratorium" on invention, is so obviously futile, as to require no summoning of the shades of history to refute it. Yet, fantastic as a returning to day before yesterday as a solution to industrial evolution would be, such a scheme is no more amazing than the present spectacle of our social mechanism, which, as far as a practical recognition of the fact of change is concerned, is still attempting to live in day before yesterday. Its rigidity in the face of change has led to wild misconceptions of what readaptation would involve and equally wild misinterpretations of the conditions that need to be dealt with. Obviously, for example, new industries, new services, could neither replace the old nor come freshly into existence if men were not, to some extent, reemployed. A new factory staff does not emerge from thin air. But with increasing rapidity new factory staffs do emerge, in steel and electricity, from the ground—in skill and efficiency, from the brain of management.

Even if released capital does in the end "tend to reabsorb" displaced men, society cannot close its eyes to the bitter private tragedies, the blasting of expectation in many lives, that linger beneath the word "tend." The difficulties furthermore involved in the nature of the new reabsorptive "services" have been discussed. Such services just are not the answer, as economic theorists would have us believe, to technological unemployment. The whole problem is distorted if it is regarded primarily as one of unemployment. It is not. The problem set, the problem that society has deliberately and disastrously ignored, is not only that of reabsorption, but of providing a living income during the transition period.

(2) Environmental unemployment.—In this list I have placed that form of unemployment that is peculiar to business engaged in certain fields of activity. It fluctuates rather to the physical and mental environment conditioning the business than to business method, though this often enters in as an overbalancing element. It is most common to industry exposed (a) to seasonal variation, (b) to excessive consumer variation in demand; social variations. In cases where the environment shows regularly recurring variations the business through long-term planning is to a limited extent able to adapt itself to or even control its environment. Where the demand is nonrecurring, as in the case of style and fashion, the business must obviously continue to fluctuate.

(a) Seasonal: Seasonal variations may be again subdivided into (1) those activities which are carried on out of doors and are directly exposed to and dominated by the seasons, and (2) manufacturing concerns that not only supply tools whose use depends on the season of the year, but those which in turn depend for their supplies of raw material on the season.

(1) All farming, crop gathering, and so on naturally fall into this group. Farmers, however, need hardly be classed among the seasonally unemployed. Though, in that they produce a surplus for market, they have been absorbed into the capitalistic circle and are as unable to live solely off their main product as is a shoe manufacturer, yet the farmer's winter can go hang as far as this paper is concerned. What industry in general needs is more, not less, farmer's winters. But nevertheless the threat of unemployment hangs over the farm. Agriculture is today no longer a Jeffersonian Utopia of sturdy independents. There is a floating army of men, women, and children, 4,500,000 strong, utterly dependent on the gathering of the crops and farm labor. The sugar beet, cotton, wheat, corn, and fruit raisers all face their seasonal "peak loads" and demand for extra help. And while the present unemployment service helps rout this army of casual labor to some degree, it has lifted not a finger toward stabilizing its fluctuating demand, or even toward rotating it from area to area in accordance with demand. Greater crop diversification in given regions are steps which farm owners themselves can take toward stabilizing employment, though the extent to which this can be carried is obviously limited. Dairy farmers alone can maintain steady employment.

The weather also obviously directly affects all outside construction work, road building in particular. That house construction in the South, however, and building in northern cities, where a large number of protective devices have been introduced, still show tremendous seasonal peaks—suggests that habit is as great an enemy to regularization as the weather. Lumbering activities are again directly subject to weather conditions, while coal mining is rather subject to a demand that in turn is governed by the seasons. All told, approximately 14,000,000 Americans and more are still directly subject to the turn of the seasons in their daily activities.

(2) Manufacturers of agricultural implements, cement, glass, and other building materials reflect back the seasons in their peak loads. There are also those industries engaged in sugar refining, canning and preserving and so on that depend for their material on weather conditions. Formerly each factory depended on its own reserve for outside help. Most still do. There is tremendous fluctuation in employment. There are many semistagnant pools of reserve labor, neither unemployed nor employed. But certain industries engaged in the above activities, recognizing not only the waste and inefficiency that the hire-and-fire haphazardness introduced to their own production, but also the human waste reflected in countless reserves of intermittently employed, have set about regularizing their production schedules. The increased efficiency of a constant labor force brings financial saving: Obviously not much expertness or skill is to be looked for in the man engaged only for a few months each year in a certain task, nor is he to be blamed if he consciously tries to stretch that task over as long a period of time as possible. The increased security in the life of the worker is worth the effort toward regularization of employment in itself

The methods used are many and vary, of course, according to industry.

The coal and ice company is the classic example.

Side lines and fillers suited to other seasons of the year and methods of production are taken up. Agricultural-implement producing firms turn to ice-skates and sleds. The Winchester Arms Co. produces a variety of hardware and camping equipment. Even a firm so utterly dependent on the season as the Columbia Conserve Co., which originally canned only tomatoes and so could not solve its difficulties by reliance on storage warehouses as many industries needing raw materials have, has had notorious success in meeting its problem. It discovered that a plant need not live by tomatoes alone. It now puts up soups and other food products which meet with a demand the year round. Its factory staff is skilled and efficient. Peaks and valleys of production are met almost entirely by a lengthening and a shortening of the hours of labor. The company guarantees a yearly salary to each employee, gives a vacation on pay, and has introduced other measures, aiming toward security and indicating that a combination of common-sense and humanity, in certain instances, can be the simplest way out of industrial difficulties. The books of the firm show that it is good business. Manufacturing to stock over a yearly rather than a monthly schedule, the use of warehouses both for the storage of raw materials and of finished product are other recognized ways of escaping the expansion and contraction of the seasons.

Some hotel companies have learned to maintain a regular staff merely by observing the migration of the birds. Staffs move to meet peak demands in sun-tanning and in canoeing. Most factory owners, having once undertaken regularization, are amazed at the simplicity of it all, and appalled at that former stupidity that assumed not only that it was good business to cram all activity into a few hectic months and stand idle the rest of the year, but that the eating and drinking and daily activities of employees must necessarily conform to the rhythm of the seasons.

(b) Social: Consumer variation may also be subdivided roughly into (1) those that affect plants supplying a more or less seasonally conditioned demand; (2) those that affect plants supplying a demand conditioned partly by habit, partly by fashion and change in style.

(1) Obviously such commodities as rubber boots, woolen and worsted goods, fur coats, bathing suits, paints, radiators, candy, ice cream, and tea all depend for their popularity ultimately on weather conditions. But because of the intervening human environment I have grouped them here. This environment may be controlled in some degree. It will react to suggestions. No "Gather your crops by winter" advertising campaign will popularize agricultural machinery and fertilizers in the off seasons, but it was precisely by a "Paint in the fall" campaign that the Sherwin Williams Co. succeeded in stabilizing its production. Spring painting up to then had been merely a habit. The American Radiator Co. broke down the spell of the seasons and was able to set up a regular production schedule by offering lower prices to off-season buyers. The Tao Tea Co., by painting the summer delights to be found in drinking iced tea, now thrives the year round. The Hill Brothers Date Co., besides introducing cold-storage warehouses to give its staff a constant supply of raw material the year round rather than depend on the uncertainties and hectic rush periods conditioned by the arrival of foreign shipments, eked out the lean periods in demand by popularizing date salads. Summer candy selections and pie à la mode emphasized by winter are other common devices for overcoming the human element in environment.

The limitations here, however, so glibly brushed over by planning optimists, are obvious and need not be stressed; in general I shall continue to paint my house, eat my ice cream, order my rubber boots, ignore date salads—whenever it pleases me. So too will foreign nations continue to erect trade barriers, declare war, without holding previous discussions with business stabilizers.

(2) Where fashion and style force consumer demand the manufacturer is helpless. No regularization can solve the production of women's clothing, shoes, and millinery goods. At least I hope it cannot. Sales can be stimulated by oily suggestions—but certainly no sane manufacturer created the short skirt demand—he had to follow. Mere buying habits on the part of jobbers and retailers, however, most certainly can and should be regulated. All producers of standardized goods can manufacture to stock on balanced monthly ratios. There is no longer need for binding up production with seasonal orders or an irrational buying environment. The Dennison Manufacturing Co. has had some success in meeting both difficulties. Not only has it introduced sidelines that cumulatively meet an all-year demand, but it has induced retailers to accept orders in lots throughout the year. By manufacturing to stock in off season it can handle all its peak demands. Other companies, such as Procter & Gamble and the Knox Hat Co. have dispensed with the irrational element in their buying environment by eliminating the jobber, and so chaos, from the lives of their employees. The Packard Motor Car Co. has broken down the wall of fashion and instituted a regular yearly plan of production distributed equally over the months. It has partly overcome the high-cost difficulties of motor-car storage by persuading dealers to encourage buying throughout the year and to accept off-season shipments of cars. These examples suffice to emphasize the main roads toward a guaranty of steady employment.

The marvel is not that steps have been taken—rather that examples are so few in a nation boasting of its business ability. As a matter of fact it has shown no such ability in the mass. It has ignored the first essentials of all conduct—simplicity and directness. Whether these can ever be set as guide rules for an industrial system that depends on no given direction for its stimulation to action but on the chaos of conflicting whims of a multitude of sellers and buyers is a matter again of conjecture. The will toward regularization can obviously achieve some minimum stabilization of employment. It can never, however, eliminate the threat of unemployment.

* * * * * * *

This is the one fact to be stressed. There is actually no longer, even in an individualistic profit system, save for a few obvious exceptions, any excuse for a continuance of the ruthless hire-and-fire method of employment. Carelessness and rank stupidity account for a large part of it. But intense competition for the consumer's dollar with consequent rising and falling in the tides of the casually employed will continue as long as society is unconcerned with methods of production that are said to serve it. For society is after all the environment that manufacturers at present must contend with. The methods of dealing with the Liverpool and Seattle dockhands are classic examples of what pooled labor reserves can accomplish toward eliminating the so-called unemployables: actually it is the elimination of human wastage. A comparison of the degree of contentment and enjoyment in life, pride in personal and community appearance reflected between towns whose inhabitants are sure of steady jobs, and those whose incomes depend on the ebbing and flowing of hunches and whims and managerial unconcern, speaks for itself.

While the odd-job, extra-hand worker will never fade out of the picture; while many of them might protest violently against being "regularized"—yet the fact cannot be escaped that a vast number of them are denied the opportunity of steady employment: haphazard industrial methods, slack management, and lack of planning have continued to regard them merely as so much factory fodder to be taken on and dropped according to convenience.

The fact also remains that many industries are so intensely interdependent that environment for any one of them is impossible to struggle against. This is particularly true of those supplying goods for producer's markets—manufacturers of capital equipment: a large part of the Middle West pulses to the fluctuating heartbeat of automobile factories. But the line of attack is not as chaotic as the problem would seem to suggest. Blueprints of a stable and planned society will probably remain blueprints for some time to come. The first line of attack is far more simple and direct.

The reduction of unemployment to a possible fluid minimum can never be accomplished while the ruthless "hire-and-fire" system is allowed to go on unchallenged. The system in itself, however, is dependent on the large reserves of men employers are allowed to keep on hand in semi-idleness and stagnation. Not only their own ignorance of where to turn prevents the exodus of these reserves, but they are kept massed by deliberately falsified information. The club of bargaining power is a privilege employers consider theirs alone: The more the men, the fewer the jobs, the lower the wage need be. Furthermore, these pools of labor make more than casual planning of production or efforts to control the market unnecessary for the employer; rush orders can always be met.

The immediate problem is distorted if it is regarded, as it appears to be on the surface, one of planned production. It is not. The problem that society can immediately and directly apply itself to is the tapping and rechanneling of these pools of stagnant labor energy.

(3) Cyclical unemployment.—And under this last heading comes the most fiendishly vicious and fertile of all forms of unemployment—unemployment bred by unemployment—both by capital and by labor. It is not the mere chronic unemployment of "normal" times, leaks of labor and human energy that intelligent patches might plug up—it is the savage, all-consuming unemployment that is born of and intensifies social sickness, spawned at an ever-increasing rate from the already existent festering masses of human stagnation. To isolate such unemployment from that socially accepted phenomenon, the subject of learned treatises and reports, the business cycle, would be to distort its significance beyond value of discussion. To pretend to cast any further light on this subject of the economic scholiasts, however, would be silly—as well as beyond the scope of this paper. What can and must be emphasized is the disastrously vicious part unemployment without the support of purchasing power plays in deepening and prolonging the cycle of depression. It is obviously something that the rosy business economists who preach Buy and a Sales Tax do not take into account—or else the assumption must be that the 15,000,000 totally unemployed, the 17,000,000 on part time, their families and dependents, are "hoarding" either no income at all or an income cut to the bone that in normal years, bloated and juicy, was hardly enough to meet the barest requirements of living.

Today to say that production cannot continue without consumption, that the two are actually one, that they differ only as points on the circumference of a circle differ, is only to utter an apparent truism. There is no beginning and no end. Their flow is the bloodstream of any economic unit, whatever its method of distribution and exchange. The individual producing plant within the economic unit can produce only as it receives, or believes it will receive, its share of the wealth with which to continue production. In a competitive society the individual plant, by acting as it is compelled to act, either when its share of the necessary wealth is actually decreased, or when it feels that there is a good chance of its decreasing, only hastens on catastrophe. If it does not receive its share of the vital stream, its only recourse, in order to preserve life, is to release still less than its former share. This action in turn slashes the share normally flowing to all other units. They, in self-defense, are forced into acting likewise. And so, completing the vicious downward spiral, the share returning to the original unit is still further drastically reduced.

The logical outcome of such a process is self-strangulation. Yet of necessity it is all good business. It is essential from the point of view of each private business man, when times, subjectively, are hard, that rigid economy be practiced. Rigid economy characterizes itself in the well-known forms of unemployment, part-time work, wage deflation, and restricted production. The cumulative action of many individual business men, each moved by his own practical concern with immediate ends, is disastrously fatal for society as a whole if it is allowed to run free and unchecked. Independence and self-sufficiency are ghastly myths that breed a vicious cycle of self-destruction. Each self-sufficient unit by attempting to prove its self-sufficiency drags down every other self-sufficient unit into a bewildered chaos of tightened mental belts amid physical plenty. The business cycle is a phenomenon peculiar to capitalist society and can neither be understood nor examined apart from a capitalist background.

The failure obviously of the individual business man seeking his own profit and steady dividend payments lies in his inability to see the consumer as the vital link in the continued flow of production as well as the very source of his own profits and dividend payments; or, what amounts to the same thing, his tragic inability to act upon his vision even if he should see clearly. Such well-intentioned action would be merely to invite destruction and, furthermore, would be entirely futile. Every business man is forced into removing consumers, because they appear on his books as costs of production, from their share of the vital flow. Like men in some ghastly nightmare, standing upon chairs, their necks collared by knotted ropes dangling from rafters above, they calmly, as though impelled by some awful force, with terrible cold sanity, one by one, kick the chairs away from under their feet. So each producer, acting either in the light of his own reason or compelled by restricted bank credit,[41] destroys purchasing power. And this is considered sound business.

Without purchasing power stagnation and the tidal wave of unemployment is on, and each man unemployed means a degree less security for the man still employed; he is one body less for which consumption goods need be produced. Eventually follows the savage and bitterly self-destructive phase of depression such as we are in the midst of now. Not only do employers fight among themselves in the desperate struggle for self-preservation, but workers also, pressed by starvation, beat one another down in the battle for jobs at any price. The would-be sane employer is reduced to the level of the common scamp profiting off the "willing" labor of men struggling against starvation. The labor-surplus of depression, without unemployment insurance to bolster its sagging and beaten down purchasing power, is more fatal to production than the glutted goods market of boom periods.[42] Industries are thrown into chaos in the fierce effort to snatch and to fill the trickle of hand-to-mouth orders sent in by cautious retailers.

The State alone, standing above, a representative of the whole, is in position to bring order out of chaos.

It is therefore peculiarly fatal when the actions of the State are dictated not by an objective and scientific view of society, but by logic determined by the practical and directly applicable thinking of the private business man. To quote Cassel: "Science must look upon economic life as a whole, and consequences which from the point of view of the individual business man are remote, may from a scientific standpoint have at least the same importance as nearer ones."[43]

The State cannot legislate business cycles out of existence. But it can, by recognizing its responsibilities, take such steps as are beyond the power of any self-reliant individual. It must launch forces moving in precisely the opposite direction from those set in motion by private business. It must restimulate the amoeba by opening new sources of purchasing power and relieving it of its cumulated waste materials. It can, to a large extent, so alter the environment that each individual productive unit may proceed to the increasing benefit rather than injury of every one else. Mr. Hoover himself, in spite of his constant retreat during the past few years from assuming a position of detached authority, once demonstrated that he had a fair grasp of the idea and stimulated many economists to false hope.[44] In 1923 he attempted to delay public works construction to a period of depression. He was attacked by the Manufacturer's Record for so doing, which was one of the greatest compliments he has ever received. But he has amply made up to the outraged gentlemen since. His 1934 budget estimates would set any manufacturer's heart beating with economic delight. The appropriations for Government buildings show a decline from the 1933 figure of $212,000,000 to $69,000,000; public improvements from $402,000,000 to $122,000,000; $18,000 is tucked carefully away for relief purposes—just in case any one should happen to lose a job. Mr. Hoover's engineering instincts have shown themselves in the end more dominating than his economic; only an engineer could seek to build a bridge of sound capital structure over the yawning chasm of lost purchasing power.

So much for a broad outlining of conditions creating unemployment. Only in one group, group II, have any active steps been taken to date toward remedy. The present depression has of course stimulated thought directed toward the problems offered by I and III, just as did that of 1921. Several of the States, 30 in varying degrees of seriousness, are considering unemployment insurance and more efficient systems of employment agencies.[45] But, encouraging as these signs are, they do not permit even the solace of feeling the barn door is to be locked after the cow is gone: a plank or two will be nailed across a gap through which a herd of cows may still be driven. Though one or two States may act as Wisconsin has acted, as Ohio is preparing to act, though certain exceptional industries have attempted to regularize output in the several ways mentioned and others may follow—what a group of business men stated as reflecting their point of view toward the problem as a whole as far as individual action was concerned, after a survey of the field in 1925, may be restated today and may be applied equally to the efforts of States as well as industries: "Private efforts * * * no matter how significant or encouraging they may be, still remain individual as far as a solution of the problem of unemployment in a large way is concerned[46] * * *."

North Carolina can just as surely undermine Massachusetts as the fly-by-night sweatshops can undersell and undermine the respectable garment shop attempting to operate and at the same time be responsible for the health and security of its employees.

The Nation has two courses before it: either to lift its people bodily into the structure of civilization which has been proved possible and to hold it there—or to resign itself to the level of its own dirt. There is no other alternative. It is monstrous idiocy to look for benevolent cooperation in a business world in which the loss of one is another's gain.

C. TOWARD CURE—FLOW AND OUTLETS

Just as I have attempted to break down the causes of unemployment into three main divisions, each of which was necessarily somewhat blurred about the edges, so I shall, for the sake of immediate clarity, break down the multitude of proposed remedies into what I believe to be three fundamental and immediately applicable approaches to a cure.

This, however, must be emphasized. The success or significance of any one of the three is dependent upon the simultaneous enactment of all three. No one is in itself a cure. Each bears with varying degrees of effectiveness upon each of the causal groups as listed above. With the bottom ripped open patchwork cannot save the boat. It is a question now as to whether or not even a whole new bottom will turn the trick. Therefore no one who pretends to have genuine interest in the preservation of the boat itself, who is sentimentally attached to its decorations and interior constructional designs, its familiar corridors and alleyways, would betray wisdom in refusing a complete overhauling of its damaged mechanism.

Many, with less interest in the old smoking-lounge atmosphere, are now taking to the lifeboats and urging the drowning crew to come with them. That more of the crew have not followed is only because their remnants of hardtack and clothing are still on board, and, from the water line, they have not seen the fertile lands toward which the lifeboats are heading, or else believe them as yet only to be mirage. But in the meantime the waters are rushing in. The crew is in the hold. The boilers, too, are down below. Complacency in the smoking lounge, while conversation has turned to shipwrecks of the long ago, lingers only because cigar smoke burns blue, and tales of wrecks at sea seem far away amid these dark-stained solid walls * * *.

The reasoning that makes the three recommendations necessarily one may be summed up as follows: A system erected for connecting the peculiar qualifications of men with suitable jobs, for surveying the trend of job opportunities, and for supplying information, while it is the groundwork for all attacks on unemployment, does not create jobs. It does not make jobs. It does not [41] What part the private banks play in determining the business policies of manufacturing corporations is impossible for me to go into. But the question cannot be ignored. The partners, for example, of J. P. Morgan & Co., Lee Higginson & Co., Kuhn-Loeb & Co., Dillon-Read & Co., Speyer & Co., J. and W. Seligman & Co., and 10 other private banks have 71 directorships in the leading commercial banks of New York, besides 996 directorships in some of the largest public utility, insurance, transportation, manufacturing, and other corporations. The eight leading commercial banks of New York, over which the private bankers have control through interlocking directorships, hold directorships in 287 insurance, 301 other banks, 521 public utility, 585 railroad, steamship, and airplane transportation companies, 846 manufacturing, and 1,201 other corporations. Among these eight banks are the Chase National, the National City, the Bankers Trust Co., and Guaranty Trust Co. Therefore, when Mr. A. G. Wiggin launches a low-wage campaign, as he did early in 1930, a large part of the country must listen—and woe betide any editor who opposes him if he is dependent on advertising for the financing of his paper or magazine. Certainly no manufacturer can run counter to "sound banking policy." His freedom of action is a myth.

[42] The time for discussing unemployment insurance reserves seriously, however, passed while Mellon was grinning over tax-rate cuts. In the words of the President's 1921 conference: "Prevention as contrasted with relief is possible only through foresight * * *." Not that they are not immediately essential, but that opposition to them today is almost insurmountable.

[43] The value of Federal construction and maintenance by fiscal years, ending June 30, was as follows:

1928	$274,000,000
1929	308,000,000
1930	340,000,000
1931	492,000,000
1932	637,000,000
1933	785,000,000

Public expenditures for permanent improvements other than Federal, exclusive of repairs and maintenance, were as follows:

1928	$2,821,000,000
1929	2,838,000,000
1930	3,054,000,000
1931	2,452,000,000
1932	900,000,000

Railroad and all public utilities:

1930	$4,000,000,000
1931	2,410,000,000
1932	1,200,000,000

Contracts awarded (factories, commercial, and residential) by calendar years:

1929	$3,400,000,000
1930	1,950,000,000
1931	1,260,000,000
1932	510,000,000

[44] The recommendations made by the President's committee on unemployment in 1921, on which Mr. Hoover sat, still make stimulating reading today!

[45] Since the writing of this paper the Wagner bill providing for a Nation-wide system of employment offices has been passed.

[46] Can Business Solve Unemployment? Lugwigson, Draper, Cannon, Lescohier.

preserve jobs. It feeds a man nothing. It can serve as a channel for free man-hours, but there is no certainty that it will dump them into wealth-producing overflow areas. It cannot unclog closed gaps. It does not regulate the flow of wealth that alone, in a profit economy, makes jobs possible. Therefore such a system must be supplemented: (a) By a legislative device aimed at creating and preserving the opportunity for work by apportioning the hours necessary for a certain quantity of production among those with a supply of labor hours to offer; (b) by machinery aimed, first at preserving the necessary flow of credit and currency that production may be absorbed by those whose jobs depend upon that absorption and consequent necessity for fresh production, and secondly at affording a constant minimum of purchasing power during jobless transitional periods. In other words, what must be aimed at is an equilibrium of gaps.

The method of procedure toward a shaping of the essential outlets has been determined by: (1) The conception of a healthy economic system as necessarily one in which the flow of producers' goods to consumers is either constant or expanding in accordance with the growth of productive technique; this is fundamental and is dependent on neither communistic nor capitalistic methods of distribution; (2) by the placing of the qualifying factors that determine the evenness of that flow in our present form of society upon that fundamental base, the profit motive; and (3) by then allowing the three causes of unemployment as listed above, when contrasted against the originally conditioned desirable state, to set up their own solution. In one hand one holds the design or pattern, in the other the roughly molded clay; by comparing the two it is immediately apparent where the clay is to be reshaped if it is to conform to the desired pattern.

1. A nation-wide system of public employment agencies must be established. Branch offices will be set up in strategic industrial and agricultural areas. These offices will be run by local, nonpolitical administrative authorities under the immediate control of the State in which it is found. State systems will in turn be linked together and given coordination by the Federal Employment Service as outlined in the Wagner bill. The present employment service will pass painlessly away.[47] The problem of sick labor distribution demands specialists and not quacks. The method of introduction of this step by Federal grants in aid to States contributing equal funds, while not the most desirably effective, is perhaps the most feasible. States are offered the opportunity of joining the plan. They are still free to accept or reject it.

This is by all odds the most essential and immediately necessary step toward attacking the problem of unemployment. Ignorance cannot be effective. Ignorance, save for the findings of unconnected investigation committees, is general today. It not only blinds all remedial steps but hangs as a cloud over employment conditions in the past. There is no factual basis to refer to. Estimates varying widely and frankly mistrusting their own conclusions alone indicate the normal amount of unemployment in the country at any time.

Some light on the present knowledge of unemployment is cast by the statement of Mr. Walter S. Gifford, director of the President's organization on unemployment relief, given before the Committee on Manufactures in January 1932.

"Senator COSTIGAN. We have had, however, some very definite estimates as to unemployment in certain parts of the country. They have been obviously conservative estimates, but a committee reported that last summer in Pennsylvania there were between 900,000 and 1,000,000 unemployed. The present estimate puts the figure in Pennsylvania somewhat in excess of 1,000,000 people. Do you regard that as a conservative estimate?

"Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know. I think that might be all right. I do not know what the working population of Pennsylvania is.

"Senator COSTIGAN. We have had estimates of New York City of approximately 750,000 people out of work and more or less in need at this time. Do you agree with that as a conservative estimate?

"Mr. GIFFORD. I think I do. I think that is perhaps all right.

"Senator COSTIGAN. Could you give us your estimate of how many in New York State are in need?

"Mr. GIFFORD. No; I could not.

"Senator COSTIGAN. Can you make an estimate for Illinois where we were advised the other day there are approximately 1,100,000 unemployed?

"Mr. GIFFORD. I could not do that.

"Senator COSTIGAN. Is your information similarly indefinite with respect to the rest of the country?

"Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir.

"Senator COSTIGAN. Do you know or does anyone else whom you can turn to know what the relief needs are in the smaller cities of the country which have no community chest organization?

"Mr. GIFFORD. No; I do not know.

"Senator COSTIGAN. Do you know what the relief needs are in the rural districts of the United States?

"Mr. GIFFORD. No.

"Senator COSTIGAN. Your committee has not assembled information of that sort?

"Mr. GIFFORD. That is correct * * *.

"Senator COSTIGAN. Did you, from any other source, acquire information which would enable you specifically to advise us how many people in the United States at this hour are on the verge of starvation?

"Mr. GIFFORD. I hove no such information.

"Senator COSTIGAN. You have no such information?

"Mr. GIFFORD. No, sir.

"Senator COSTIGAN. How much money is available to meet the needs in America? You have stated that the needs are not known to you. How much money is available to meet these unknown needs?

"Mr. GIFFORD. Well, certainly there should be enough available to meet them.

"Senator COSTIGAN. In any event, your organization has made no affirmative effort to tabulate the facts with respect to the human needs throughout the United States?

"Mr. GIFFORD. That is correct * * *."[48]

I cite this as the consequence of profound ignorance in grappling with a problem the immensity of which was not and could not be grasped by those in authority. There was no means of securing information. There was nothing but the vestigial remains of the war-time United States Employment Service which was a constant source of misinformation.

* * * * * * *

Indeed, one cannot refrain from speculating as to what would have happened had an adequate system of local fact-finding agencies been in existence during the period from their post-war destruction, through 1929, to the present. It is somewhat ironic that the same Mr. Hoover who served on the committee for investigation of unemployment in 1921, that recommended then the promotion of a Nation-wide system of employment agencies, should have been the man to have vetoed the first affirmative effort toward bringing order out of chaos, 10 years later: "to prevent a serious blow to labor". By this he meant a blow to labor politicians. Rather than putting the job of attacking chaos in the hands of civil-service employees and skilled experts, the President turned it over to the lumpy fists of Doak. Doak winked. Democratic hacks turned Republican hacks overnight and found themselves cosily pillowed as Doak Employment Bureau chiefs. Bleary optimism resumed its blinking.[49]

Certainly years of blundering, of miscalculation, of duplication of effort, of not knowing when or with what to strike, would have been eliminated. Relief, had the need arisen at all, could have been immediately and adequately applied. There would in all probability have been no stampede drives for charity with quotas set not according to what crisis demanded but to what it was estimated a community could afford.

Listen to the bulletin reports of the United States Employment Service, as it now exists, as the depression gathered headway. Mr. Jones, its head, as a distinguished economist observed, "has revealed his incapacity in increasing measure with the years." Watch it month by month, revealing itself through a bulletin issued with all the authority of officialdom to back its appalling misinformation.

November 29, 1929: "Movements now under way will have an encouraging effect on industry, which will mean an increase in the volume of employment. All signs are encouraging and better economic conditions should prevail in the immediate future."

January 1930: "After a careful survey of the business outlook we enter the new year with optimistic spirit and high hopes and predict that 1930 will measure in volume of business with the preceding year * * *."

February 1930: "Business and industry appear to be consolidating the progress made in January for an expected upturn during the spring months * * *."[50]

Actually, between November 1929 and the expected upturn of the spring months, the volume of unemployment exactly doubled itself, and, continuing through the summer at the same rate, had tripled itself by August.

Thus was the President's committee armed to meet rather with the powers of darkness than with the specific needs of unemployment. What it did was to organize a sort of cheering section. It backed the disastrous policy of imposing the burden of relief on local communities—ignorantly and blandly. It supported a system of "poor relief" hardly adequate during the reign of Queen Elizabeth and finally outmoded by the industrial revolution. Its validity rests on the fantastic assumption that industrial areas are actually self-dependent; that the cigarette industry, for example, derives its wealth entirely from within the borders of North Carolina; the automobile industry from Michigan; that coal-mining areas are independent of the industrial needs of the country. It failed to take into consideration the nature of our modern corporate system. It ignored the concentrated wealth in the hands of modern "absentee landlords" and therefore imposed added tax burdens on the shoulders of those least able to bear them. Of the relief funds raised in this country approximately 70 percent was derived from taxes, the remaining 30 percent from charity drives up to 1931; public funds now bear 90 percent of the burden, private drives, 10 percent; and exhaustion is in sight for both. Few States and no municipalities have the power to levy income taxes. Taxes, therefore, fell on local property in distressed areas. The policy of local relief therefore further irritated the very incongruities that had plunged the Nation into depression. By forcing those least able to pay it not only precipitated the number of evictions and destroyed property values, but disastrously weakened consuming power and added another block to recovery. Local relief relieved the rich, not the poor.

[47] One of Miss Perkins' first moves was to discard the Doak system.

[48] The blame is not entirely Mr. Gifford's. Definite information, now, 1 year later, is still lacking, as is the machinery to bring it forth.

[49] For a full account of the Doak system in action, see The United States Employment Service, by Ruth M. Kellogg, University of Chicago Social Science Studies, XXIX.

Public employment agencies of course would afford far more service than that of providing a constant check on the volume of employment in each industrial community. Their crying need grows directly out of the tempo and characteristics of modern industry. There is good reason to believe that all the forces that we have set down as making for industrial instability in the past will continue, possibly increase in the future. Technological improvements will certainly continue. New industries will arise, go through a period of initial expansion, and arrive at a point of satisfying a fairly constant demand. Old industries will grow obsolete. Their demand for fresh labor will constrict. There will be an increasing need for a rechanneling and reeducation of labor. Industrially decadent areas must be given information of new opportunity, the stagnant surplus pools drained off. It must be no longer necessary for armies of bewildered, ignorant, unwanted men to stray from State to State in hopeless pursuit of elusive rumor. There are better ways of connecting the right men with the right jobs.

In addition to responding to the needs suggested by my first group of unemployment causes public employment agencies will have far-reaching effects on the second. They will help crush the evil of intermittent employment. They will drain off the half-idle pools of men kept by factories to meet their peak loads. They will enable factories to stabilize and give the promise of steady employment to a selected group, knowing that they can draw on the agency for reserves. Thus instead of innumerable factories with innumerable men not knowing from day to day whether they will be called upon or not, growing despondent and shiftless, labor reserves may be pooled, and one constant source in a given area will take the place of many to meet peak loads as they arrive. Efficiency in the labor market will mean increased efficiency in industrial methods. This has been demonstrated again and again. Boom-industrially induced flowing of men to crowded centers will be reduced to a supplying of actual demand.

Just how the regularization of employment can be attained through the cooperation of public employment agencies has been partially demonstrated here in America by the work of an experimental center set up in Rochester, N.Y. The following is a short report on its activities in that line taken from the February 1933 midmonthly issue of the Survey: "* * * The center has for a year and a half carried on a field-work campaign to develop the clearing-house idea in the industry in question. This industry has six large factories in the Rochester area, each employing more than 500 workers in a normally busy season, 15 smaller factories, and 4 plants making units used in the business. * * * Before the public employment service stepped in the industry had recruited its labor through want ads, and had always suffered a dearth of skilled workers in peak periods. By agreement with the service plant superintendents and foremen now call the center when they need extra help. A policy of openly borrowing workers from plant to plant has been adopted, with the center as a clearing house. The center got the cooperation of one of the trade schools to train workers in new operations and to retrain workers who have been out of the industry for some time. A new industry using the same type of skilled operators recently located in Rochester. It was informed by the employment center of the seasonal complications of the older industry, and has arranged its production schedule to miss the peaks of the other plants. In this way employment periods for a large group of workers will be spread out, and neither industry will be crippled for lack of skilled workers at its busy season." I shall return to the experimentary work now being carried on by the several trial centers now in operation in America.

Public employment agencies offer, of course, no panacea. They are not a cure-all for unemployment. They create no jobs. But they do offer a practical and humane approach to one of the constant problems set up by modern industry. They give the only answer to long weary months of gate-to-gate job hunting, to weary days of street plodding, to the hopelessness of being unattached, without a job, and of feeling a world sweep on without one. They alone can preserve the act of saving on the part of today's workman from becoming a mockery, can keep pride in one's self and one's skill and ability from becoming a farce. They must be regarded for what they are, in the light of the problems they are designed to attack, and looked to for nothing magical. Essentially they are channels facilitating a flow necessary to the amoeba. They are a vital factor in the continued running of the economic mechanism.

To sum up: A coordinated system of public employment agencies can, by promoting a more efficient distribution of labor, reduce to some degree the amount of unemployment, and be of service to both workers and employers.

1. By providing a central place to which both jobs and applicants are referred, they will lessen the time lost by workers in hunting for jobs, as well as the expenses employers suffer in constant and unnecessary interviewing and advertising.

2. By providing a central labor reserve they can remove the necessity for individual enterprises maintaining separate and distinct reservoirs of labor to meet peak loads, especially in the case of those industries employing large groups of casual workers; in removing this constant threat, an existent labor surplus which menaces those employed, they attack the standard-lowering bargaining power of employers.

3. By protecting workers from exactions of private employment agencies that charge excessive fees for inadequate service; that are guilty of every conceivable type of fraud that can be practiced on the unprotected and helpless job hunter.

4. By providing special services for particular groups: for juveniles, women workers, and the aged vocational guidance and reeducation; for those who are forced out of industry or a locality by industrial shifts and are today without adequate protection and are left at the mercy of those interested in local real-estate values—the benefit of transportation.

5. By furnishing information on the state of the labor market, both as a whole, and in relation to specific industries and lines of work: Special investigations gotten up in times of crisis are expensive, unwieldy, too late to be of use—and often ignorant.

6. By affording a constant nervous sensory contact with industrial conditions and the needs of workers, and, should emergency again arise, by providing in readiness the skeleton outline of defenses against hunger.

7. Finally, when public unemployment insurance is established, a system of employment offices will be essential to the efficient administration of the measure. Only so can a check be kept on the willingness or unwillingness of a man receiving benefits to work—only so can the largely imaginary danger of dependence on benefits be avoided.

It is interesting to note reports from those pioneering experimental agencies now being carried on in Rochester, Philadelphia, and Minneapolis. They have recently been set up by special funds appropriated by the State and municipality. They serve as working models of what public agencies may be expected to do. In addition their experience will be of inestimable importance with the launching of the Wagner bill. They have added American technique, ingenuity, and efficiency to lessons learned from the long-established free system of England and continental countries.[51]

The first essential difference between the new and what remains of the old public employment service is in the type of office and in the section of town it is found. Every type of wage earner is catered to. The new offices are in thriving sections of the city. Their rooms are large, modern in design, light, scrupulously clean. Each office is spaced off; its staff is divided to take care of different occupational groups: technical and professional, sales and clerical, skilled hands, industrial workers, domestic and institutional workers, unskilled labor. Each applicant is shunted off to his respective division. There he is given a record blank to fill out. A Rochester office, for example, requires the applicant to set down his name, age, address, height, weight, marital status, dependents, work desired, salary required, restrictions as to place of work, educational degree and special training, the names and addresses of former employers, duties and responsibilities while employed, and, finally, reasons for leaving the last job. The applicant is then granted a private interview.

Similar to the cards filled out by applicants are employer's order cards stating in detail all job specifications, wage or salary, type of man desired, etc. Calls for workers come in as well by telephone and mail, or the employer may pay a personal visit to the agency. All jobs secured are followed up by the agency. For example, during the first 10 months of 1932, 59,110 men and women registered at the 3 Minnesota offices, of whom 23,425 were placed, 40 percent in permanent positions. Rochester reports during the same 10 months over 13,000 applicants, more than one third of whom were successfully placed. Neither showing bad for a slack year.

As yet these offices, in their experimentary stage, have not the advantage of the German offices where employers are required to report vacancies. They still have to sell their services. But an increasing number of firms are placing all their orders in the hands of these agencies. At present their own proved efficiency is the sole means, not only of routing out private agencies, but of gaining employers' confidence: they are on a business, not a charity basis. William H. Stead, head of the Minnesota project, reports: "The members of the staff have made 2,189 employer contacts or visits, each of them reported in full. As a result of these contacts, a total of 2,000 employers have used the service, most of them a number of times. This figure does not include individual employers of domestics, farm labor, and casual workers. * * * These 2,000 employers have placed orders for 35,212 workers; 42,735 applicants have been referred for consideration, and 33,402 verified placements have resulted. Approximately 40 percent of these placements are regular or permanent positions."

In addition to the service of bringing together jobs and men these agencies bring out curves of local business activities and employment, affording real foundation for further reaches of the work. The Minneapolis agency after a number of tests on representative members of various occupational groups has drawn up "profiles" charting skill and personality to afford a guide toward ascertaining the aptitude of applicants for jobs. This is but a summary of the possibilities the plan affords.

Above all must be emphasized their nonpolitical character. Governor Pinchot on the opening of the Philadelphia unit wrote the State employment commission: "The first and all-important step to the success of the Philadelphia experiment means its severance from all political affiliations. All of its appointments must be made clearly on the basis of experience and technical training for this highly important endeavor * * *. This work must be honestly and equally free from political control."

Not least of all these local experiments have clearly and convincingly demonstrated the crying need for not only State-wide but Nation-wide interlocking units. To quote a summary of their findings: "Again and again staff members have pointed out how the individual offices are hampered by being unrelated enterprises rather than units in a country-wide scheme. Their records and experience show that even in a depression, difference in climate, in the supply of raw materials, in market demand, style changes, and the manufacturing operations that cater to them accentuate an oversupply of labor at one point, while at another, factories or canneries may be running extra shifts and calling for more workers. These peaks and troughs of activity are of course sharper and more frequent in normal times. Similarly there is a shifting demand for skill. The resulting flow of labor is not determined by city or State lines. It is to the advantage of both employers and employees that the offices which would serve this flow, stop its leaks of wasted working time, and help stabilize the wage-earning market, should be interconnected."

In the end, then, such a system may have a marked effect on all three of the indicated causes of unemployment, cyclical as well. And in depressed times, because of their cracking up of the pools of labor reserve, keeping them in a state of fluidity rather than stagnation, they will be of invaluable service in preventing the drastic bidding down of wage-scale and labor standards that occur when workers fight among themselves for jobs—or starvation. Above all they will relieve charity of an unjust load and enable it to attend to its own job; attending the social misfits, the aged, and the sick. No charity organization was formed to either pay an incompetent manager's wages for him whenever it pleased him to lay a man off, or to bear the burden of a chaotic industry.

The danger of technological unemployment is furthermore multiplied if improvements are taking place simultaneously in a large number of industries and is particularly aggravated if the commodities are subject to an inelastic demand. The consequent lag in consuming power may actually precipitate depression. With a common clearing house for jobs in existence it can be determined what times are best for bringing about the change. Technological shifts can be staggered to a certain extent. Advance notice of such shifts can be supplied the office, which could then work toward securing the rough equivalent of old jobs for the displaced workers.

In any case their reeducational work will make the advance of industry less ruthless in its antiquating of old skill. The sufferings of displaced workers is neither inevitable nor need it be forever regarded merely as one of the prices of progress—an easy thing for those who never pay. The real value of employment agencies here must be realized. This is their effective field. They supplement in the labor world the exchanges that have long existed to facilitate operations in the financial and trade world. The displacement of labor cannot be avoided, nor is it necessarily a social evil. It is the failure to reabsorb labor that is the root of all concern in the problem of unemployment. And it is this problem that a public employment service can directly attack. Sir William Beveridge in concluding his remarks on such a system wrote: "It is a policy of making reality correspond with the assumption of economic theory * * *. The ideal for practical reform, therefore, must be to concentrate the demand and to give the right fluidity to the supply."

(2) A 6-hour day, 5-day week for manufacturing industries:

We have continually during the brief study of the decade 1920–30 noted the disastrous effect, the waste in human energy, of materials, and of money wrought by following the policy of withdrawing men rather than man-hours from industry. Rather than society's realizing in increased leisure time the profits derived from machine and managerial efficiency, the profits were shunted back into industry and new burdens thrust on the back of a crumbling purchasing power. The final pressure of forced selling succeeded in the end in overthrowing the whole top-heavy structure. But up to that time the cost of prolonged hours were borne by consumers; annually they footed an advertising bill of over a billion dollars; they paid for organized propaganda schemes launched by the public utilities in pamphlets and doctored textbooks; they paid for countless wastes in distribution; they paid for surplus and unneeded plant material; they paid for wasted machinery and artificially induced obsolescence to speed the demand for new buying.

The essential overflow of man-hours from industry, in other words, was channelled not into the only remaining area of safety, but into waste enterprise or unemployment.

For the first time, as I have pointed out, we are faced with a situation in which there is no normal overflow for a glutted labor market. At the same time no immigration restrictions can or should bar the entrance of millions of mechanical and socially useful men. The labor market can be relieved in only two ways. The first, the socially desirable, logical, and now desperately necessary way is by the withdrawal of man-hours leaving man in touch with his source of vital wealth. The second, the path dictated by our industrial frontiersmen, was the forcing of socially unnecessary men into socially unnecessary labor resulting in waste, oily advertising pressure, actual overproduction, and tragic denial of man's right to an opportunity of self-development and self-knowledge once he had completed his socially necessary task of labor.

The time has passed when labor power is normally absorbed into new industry. Unless something akin to the automobile arises that responds spontaneously to an instinctive desire of man, new goods demand an organized high-pressured campaign to force their undesired qualities on an overburdened market. "With the introduction of machinery the percentage of 'labor-hours' or 'man-days' required for the production of those necessary goods like food, shelter, and clothing, which we spontaneously desire and demand, has rapidly decreased. As a result an ever-increasing part of the practically constant amount of expended labor energy is forced into the production of goods less necessary to those with purchasing power, goods for which demand must finally be created * * *."[24]

Charles Merz has described this process as follows: "It is impossible to put much trust in the quaint notice of Emerson's that if a man living in the woods makes a good enough mousetrap, the whole world will beat a path to his door to buy it. Launch a new mousetrap in 1928 and the effect is spectacular. Surveys are undertaken to determine the presumptive sales resistance of potential purchasers of mousetraps of different sizes, shapes, and colors. A national advertising campaign is undertaken to instruct the country in the use of bait. Pictures of villages in flames call attention to the fact that more harm is done by mice annually than was done in Belgium by the German Army in 1914. Prizes are offered for the best letter on mice, the mortal foe of man. Mice clubs are organized in public schools and October 6–12 is announced at "National antimouse week." At the proper moment the "Mousetrap boys" strike up at station DKA, broadcasting ukulele programs * * *."

The census shows that the percentage of labor energy used for selling and distribution increased from 19 percent in 1850 to 51 percent in 1920. The comparatively stable price levels throughout the ensuing decade, coupled with the unprecedented saving in the cost of man-labor exploded in a volcanic eruption of released selling pressure that flooded like lava across the country; style battled with style, brand with brand, and color with color.

And unemployment itself, by cracking up the solid bargaining power of employed labor, by being forced into endlessly diversified and makeshift jobs, actually consumes its energy in decreasing the amount of claims to wealth which it is necessary to pay for the labor-hours required to turn the wheels of industry.

Actually today the cost of production determines only the lower limit below which value cannot go. The surplus free for excess spending, for excess plant, for foreign philanthropy, and advertising, has demonstrated that the wages paid out in industry today are merely nominal and based on the habits of a time when labor costs were in fact a major item in the costs of production. The average for American industry today is approximately 16 percent.

What has not had recognition, however, is that a reduction in the hours of labor today need not greatly increase the cost of commodities. A general reduction in the hours of labor, made mandatory by Federal legislation, would serve to eliminate partially the costs of industrial waste which are today the major items of the cost of production. In other words, sugary sales attention would be exchanged for leisure and increased bargaining power of the workers. Nor would such a step in any way interfere with the competitive character of United States industry. The struggle for increased efficiency would go on—even be further stimulated. "The contention that real output and real wages would fall if hours were reduced is based on ignorance of modern engineering and is just the reverse of the truth * * *," concludes Dahlberg.[25]

[25] As partial supporting evidence comes this report from the management of the Kellogg Cereal Co., which recently turned from the 8- to the 6-hour shift:

Increased daily production from the plant as an operating unit.

Decreased overhead.

Increased return from the capital invested in plant and machinery.

Opportunity for reorganizing working force to fit all pegs in appropriate holes.

Elimination of cafeteria expense.

(Bulletin of the Women's Bureau, No. 105.)

So much for the general background of the bill.

The spiritual opportunities which its passage affords to the millions pressed by modern industry into lives haunted by insecurity and deadened by drudgery the imagination can toy with.

Now must be discussed the difficulties some have felt a bill regulating the hours of labor through interstate commerce would have in finding constitutional sanction. In the first place any conception of a vital society progressing through successive stages of growth cancels out a picture of a rigid Constitution that must be preserved in virginal innocence free from the contaminating influence of times and altered environment. It is not a museum piece but the constant reflection of the attitude of men living in today toward the responsibilities of government. So it was to the men who created it—so it has remained to a remarkable extent to the succeeding waves of living generations that followed. It is not rigid. It is plastic and living. Only those who are themselves dead or mentally rigid can conceive of the duties of government as being similarly conditioned. It was not intended that the Constitution as originally drawn up should remain undefiled amid the ruins of a decaying civilization.

The shipment of lottery tickets was once socially sanctioned. Congress has since seen fit to control the lottery business under the commerce clause of the Constitution and was upheld by the Supreme Court. In the same way adulterated or misbranded foods and drugs have come under the Federal control. In other words, Congress has regulated interstate commerce insofar as the goods shipped were felt to contain socially destructive elements within them.

A piece of paper is of course harmless and cannot be classed with a drug or an adulterated food product. But when a piece of paper carries certain printed matter on it making it adaptable for lottery purposes, then it is socially destructive. In other words, the Supreme Court does not limit its decisions to the inherent quality of the good but rather to the social effects the purpose for which the good created may have.

A suit of clothes produced under 6-hour-day working conditions will differ in no essential respect qualitatively from a suit of clothes manufactured under sweatshop exploited labor conditions. But the effect on society at large of the latter may be to utterly disrupt and undermine all civilized standards of working conditions—it may be to throw more men out of work, to further remove potential consumers from the sources of their consuming power, and so to plunge the Nation itself into economic chaos and to destroy the slow growth of a century's progress.

Those who argue endlessly with fine-spun logic cut from the fabric of former decisions of the Supreme Court resemble medieval scholiasts in their complete separation from the pressing concern of present-day life. They reflect nothing more than their own ingrown prejudices. And whatever they may say, whatever the conclusions they may draw, nothing can alter the fact that the Supreme Court itself has 35 times reversed its decisions. Society will act to preserve itself. It is an animal organization. It will use its native intelligence to combat changed environmental conditions. To say that the Constitution, born 150 years ago in, so far as the living are concerned, an alien land, cannot change, is to say that a man born in Florida, used all his life to sunshine and warmth, cannot buy himself a winter coat when he goes North.

With great ponderousness the opponents of the Black Bill pointed to the decision of the Supreme Court in Hammer v. Dagenhart: It concerned the transportation in interstate commerce of goods made at a factory in which there was employment of children within certain ages and for a certain number of hours a day and days in a week. The Court by a 5–4 decision held regulation of such traffic to be unconstitutional. In other words the ingrown prejudices gathered from the childhood environment of one old man is assumed to determine whether or not, in the present instance, the Government has the right to act toward affording the opportunity of work, toward offering economic liberty in the land of opportunity and freedom. This type of logic is truly fantastic. Yet it commands much sober consideration. If it were not so tragic it would be funny.

The minority report in this case read: "The act does not meddle with anything belonging to the States. They may regulate their internal affairs and their domestic commerce as they like. But when they seek to send their products across the State line, they are no longer within their rights. If there were no Constitution and no Congress, their power to cross the line would depend upon their neighbors. Under the Constitution such commerce belongs not to States but to Congress to regulate. It may carry out its views of public policy whatever indirect effect they may have upon the activities of the States. Instead of being encumbered by a prohibitive tariff at her boundaries, the State encounters the public policy of the United States, which it is for Congress to express. The public policy of the United States is shaped with a view to the benefit of the Nation as a whole."

To quote Charles E. Hughes: "A dissent in a court of last resort is an appeal to the brooding spirit of the law, to the intelligence of a future day, when a later decision may possibly correct the error into which the dissenting judge believes the court to have been betrayed. * * *"

And again on the commerce clause: "How far does the power of Congress go in its affirmative action under the commerce clause? The power to regulate is the power to 'foster, protect, control, and restrain.' Chief Justice Marshall said that it was as wide as the exigencies which called it into existence, and it may be added that under the decision of the Supreme Court it remains as wide as the modern exigencies it must meet in relation to interstate and foreign commerce. Few lawyers 40 years ago would have dreamed of the extensive schemes of Federal legislation which have successfully passed judicial scrutiny as to their constitutional validity. * * *"

And in conclusion, to allow one further legal voice to sound, one which realizes that a living law reflects the best standards of a living people—Justice Brandeis: "I cannot believe that the framers of the fourteenth amendment or the States which ratified it intended to leave us helpless to correct the evils of technological unemployment and excess productive capacity which the march of invention and discovery has entailed. There must be power in the States and the Nation to remold through experimentations our economic practices and institutions, to meet changing social and economic needs."

One must first know what interest a man represents before his opposition to a progressive measure on constitutional grounds can be taken at full value.[54]

It would be hopeless to try here to investigate in its totality the industrial chaos that is in existence today. It is the hysteria of men, employers and employees, struggling with no firm ground beneath their feet in nightmare turmoil to keep above the slowly sinking mass beneath them. The 6-hour day 5-day week bill would do just one thing. It would set a firm foundation on which to stand—below which no one could sink. It would establish a common ground from which competition could start afresh. It would reopen one clogged gap vital to the reabsorption of labor.

Take the case of a silk mill in Paterson, N.J. The owner in order to maintain himself must travel down every avenue open toward lowering cost of production. The question of laying men off is present and immediate. He must do so in sheer self-protection. He cannot afford, while 530 other manufacturers are laying men off, to consider the broader aspects of the question. It is nothing to him that industry at large is committing suicide and destroying its own market. He must act savagely and quickly. Yet one man, in an effort to outbid all others, is in power to set the whole vicious spiral in action.

Therefore we have this spectacle in Paterson today: Men and women are working up to 17 hours daily in single shifts. The average minimum shift is 10 hours a day—55 hours a week. Wages have of course slipped back to those of a primitive era in silk production. The output per capita has jumped increasingly through the depression years and although many factories work 1 man to 10 looms, the hours of labor since 1929 in Paterson have jumped 25 percent. The individual manufacturer is caught in a whirlpool from which there is no escape. The most unscrupulous leads the way. No one man, unless he wishes to commit business suicide, can either shorten his hours, increase his pay roll, or employ more men.

The problem is a national one.

Take the manufacturing of broad silks in Pennsylvania. Mills do not dare manufacture to stock however much more economical a continuous and stabilized productive chart would be for them. They are reduced to hand-to-mouth order snatching. They are utterly under the control of haphazard selling agents. And the very methods which they are driven into if they would fill any orders at all are driving them to insolvency and bankruptcy. Plants are completely idle from 2 to 3 days a week. Then, with a minimum number of looms in operation, they are run continually the rest of the week on two 12-hour shifts daily. While wages are down over 60 percent, hours of labor have jumped 40 percent. Ninety percent of these mills are concentrated in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. Ninety percent of these mills agreed that the 30-hour week was the simplest, most certain, most practical road from chaos. At a conference of textile manufacturers called by Governor Pinchot the owners declared that general regulation alone could save them from insolvency, relieve them from the pressure of beating one another out in order snatching. Ninety percent of these mills faced the problem realistically and saw that individually they were lost. Ten percent of the silk mills scattered throughout the South, where labor exploitation is taken for granted, by refusing to cooperate, were able to plunge the industry once more into chaos.

The problem is a national one.

The tale of cotton-textile mills is similar. Again a minority of mill owners are able to throw a whole industry out of gear, and the individual is helpless. Mills where scientific management had introduced stability, increased production under shorter [54] For a full and adequate discussion of the legal phases touching on the regulation of hours of industry by Congress, see Senator BLACK's speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Apr. 3, 1933.

The reaction of a prominent Connecticut banker, for example, is interesting: "Starting with the notion that the measure was unconstitutional beyond a doubt, I finished with the conviction that there is at least * * * a 4-to-5 chance that the Supreme Court will uphold it. I had no idea that Senator BLACK could make so able a constitutional argument * * *."

hours, regular employment, and decent working conditions for employees have been driven to order snatching with the scabbiest southern mill owner driving his looms at full blast by day and by night. In Massachusetts the situation has grown so threatening that Governor Ely has moved to repeal statutory laws to allow night work. Yet the country has cotton looms enough to supply more than its annual needs running on the 30-hour week. But now not only is the individual employer helpless but whole States and sections of the country are unable to protect themselves or their workers against ruthless driving of easy labor.

The problem is of national concern.

The full-fashioned hosiery industry, after long years of struggle, had managed to achieve for itself a certain degree of stability. Now it, too, forced to grab for orders, is at the mercy of the winds. It has equipment to supply the country annually with 40,000,000,000 dozen pairs of women's full-fashioned stockings. Now more than half its plant is idle. The remainder runs spasmodically. Hours have jumped from 40 to 54 and 60 a week. When orders are in, mills operate through Sunday with wages exactly half their former level. It is no wonder that owners and employees urge the passage of the Black bill. The directors of the Hosiery Association, representing 33 plants in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts, and Wisconsin, declared: "We firmly believe that your bill would provide steady employment for the present working personnel of our industry * * *. It would result in increased hourly earning capacity * * *. It is a tremendous step forward in industrial legislation * * *."

That such a step must be mandatory, must be universally applicable, is self-obvious. There is no other way of jerking the country sharply from its slow certain spiral toward self-destruction. Industry is gnawing its very guts out to seek food for itself.

As a representative of the National Furniture Manufacturers puts it: "Industry must go on bended knees to the Federal Government and beg that the situation be controlled." There are still a great many men who want to go on making money in a decent way.

Actually, after years of hand-to-mouth buying there is a tremendous shortage of commodities in the United States. With knowledge that a majority of the men now detached from sources of purchasing power would again be steadily employed, with uncertainty removed from the lives of those now employed, not only would orders once more begin but a large amount of hoarding would be released into circulation.

The testimony of manufacturers of representative industries over all the United States is overwhelmingly to the effect that even should industry be given its 1929 market not over one half of those now unemployed could be reabsorbed at the present hour rate; it is also overwhelmingly to the effect that Federal legislation alone can prevent what once approached civilization from crumbling into chaos at the whim of the lowest bidder.

In southern furniture mills men are working at 10 and 15 cents an hour.

In Lynn shoe factories men are receiving 6 to 8 cents for a full morning's work: $1.82 a week is "top pay."

In New Haven, Conn., a dress company is paying its women employees 65 cents a week. In Middletown, Conn., a woman with two children received $1.40 for 2 weeks' work. And there is an army of 10,000 such women and girls in the United States today—working up to 65 and 70 hours a week. Bargain dresses go big in depressed times.

Eight hundred and fifty thousand railroad workers alone represent a loss of $1,410,000,000 in purchasing power.

With 15,000,000 unemployed, the most recent and still somewhat conservative estimate, one third of the Nation's population is unconnected with any source of regular income.

Sixty-seven percent of those in employment are working on part time: "The meager wage paid to 1 man for 4 or 5 days' work is divided under the share-the-work plan between 2 men, each working 2 days a week, and each has only one half of what 1 had before * * *."[55]

But relief does not touch these so-called "employed", and many of the completely jobless, though living in chronic poverty, are at least more sure of weekly food rations than those under Mr. Teagle's bright little share-the-work movement.

There exists virtual slavery in nonunionized coal mining districts. Bituminous-coal miners have been urging the 6-hour day for a decade; and within that time, from 1920 to 1931, machinery has increased the per capita production from 4 to 5.3 tons a day, displacing 100,000 miners.

It is needless to go on.

One fact is obvious: the bargaining power of labor has been utterly shattered and starvation is a whip in the unscrupulous employer's hand. Other employers must follow—down, down, the inevitable road to stagnation.

Mr. Baker, a Paterson manufacturer, and secretary of the American Raw Thrown Silk Association, put the case well for the Black bill when he said: "Establishing the 30-hour week as the workweek, by law, establishes the right of the worker to a wage for a 30-hour week which will maintain an American standard of living. It challenges the theory that workers of every sort exist to enrich land speculators, stockholders, and financial exploiters, and establishes the principle that labor is the first fixed charge upon industry taking precedence of any and every investment of capital. Investment of effort is entitled to pay before investment of capital."

The need for this bill springs directly from the indicated trends of American industry during the past decade. It is not in any sense an emergency measure. Besides re-creating lost-job opportunity, it will have tremendous effect on the secondary list of unemployment causes I have drawn up, in that it will force orders for goods to depend upon a stabilized workday conditioning their manufacture. The hire-and-fire system will thus receive another deathblow.

The rigid conditions set forth in the Black bill are far from perfect. But it is an entering wedge for the concept: Hours, not men, must fluctuate according to market demand. The passage of such a bill automatically involves the setting up of such an administrative agency as is proposed in the following section. Wages, too, must come under central authority. The key to the situation is always purchasing power—the primary employer of men.

(3) ECONOMIC ADVISORY COUNCIL: THE MARKET FLOW

"The fundamental principles are that social problems are products of change, and that social changes are interrelated. * * * These interrelated changes which are going forward in such bewildering variety and at such varying speeds threaten grave dangers with one hand, while with the other hand they hold out the promise of further betterment to mankind. The objective of any conscious control over the process is to secure better adjustment between inherited nature and culture. The means of social control are social discovery and the wider adoption of new knowledge. * * *

"The emerging problem is that of closer coordination and more effective integration of the swiftly changing elements in American social life. What are the prerequisites of a successful long-time constructive integration of social effort?

"Indispensable among these are the following:

"Willingness and determination to undertake important integral changes in the reorganization of social life, including the economic and the political orders, rather than the pursuance of a policy of drift.

"Recognition of the role which science must play in such a reorganization of life.

"Continuing recognition of the intimate interrelationship between changing scientific techniques, varying social interests and institutions, modes of social education and action, and broad social purposes.

"Specific ways and means of procedure for continuing research and for the formulation of concrete policies as well as for the successful administration of the lines of action indicated.

"Out of these methods of approach it is not impossible that there might in time emerge a national advisory council, including scientific, educational, governmental, economic (industrial, agricultural, and labor) points of contact * * * able to contribute to the consideration of the basic social problems of the Nation."

The above quotation is from the findings of the President's Research Committee on Social Trends. It consists of words. Words clothe ideas. Ideas emerge from experience. What do they represent? "A cooperative effort on a very broad scale to project into the field of social thought the scientific mood and the scientific method as correctives to undiscriminating emotional approach and to insecure factual basis, in seeking for corrective remedies of great social problems," answers ex-President Hoover for me.

In other words they represent the emergent realization, reached after an exhaustive survey of the Nation on the part of a committee of intelligent men only to be described as conservative, of the need of the formation of a permanent body of skilled advisers, whose duty shall be objectively to coordinate the always-chaotic, now hopelessly destructive, energies of this organic unit, the United States of America.

The words clothe an idea. The idea that we wish to hold to is this: Men and republicans in general can control more of their economic environment than tariff frontiers.

And what are ideas, burningly apparent ideas, ideas demanding action, put into words for? To inject occasional shots of emotional adrenaline on reference? The depression of 1921 injected many such shots into the principle of voluntary action.

What, for example, is a machine?

It is the material embodiment of an idea that men, in response to a felt need, have had the energy and will to pluck off a blueprint. It does in fact clothe the cumulative ideas of a multitude of minds that have passed through physical experience. A machine then is a cumulative body of thought expressed in material form—an idea acted upon in response to a social need.

Thoughts can be embodied then, even social thoughts, despite the evidence of traceless numbers of committees of investigation that have come and gone with urgent recommendations. Need is not always blatantly apparent.

But the need today for the erection into material form of a permanent body of men, furnishing in the mere act of its erection a constant source of information, applying effective directional pressure, as opposed to continued reliance on amoebic drift, on occasional investigations appointed to probe the cause of a social crisis long after it has occurred, can be emphasized no longer. The futility of depending upon voluntary action grows tedious in stressing. Such action has demonstrated conclusively that individual initiative, as wielded by those few who are still privileged to lay social claim to it, rampant within an interdependent social group, may now only be depended upon: First, to create the crisis; secondly, to sharpen it almost to the point of social disintegration.

Our entire physical foundation is collective in form. I, the bourgeois American of 1933, no less than my father of yesterday, or of 1776, still demand my right to express my individualism. But not at the price of my own nakedness. Am I less myself because of the fact that every physical want I have satisfied is the result of collective effort? The very foundation of my individualism is the collective clothing and feeding of my body. Individualism has no other meaning in terms of modern society; nor can individualism ever effectively express the creed of this individualist nation until society maturely and realistically assumes its material collective responsibilities. Until the day this Nation regards the clothing and the feeding of its members solely as the means toward life, not the end, not life in itself, and shapes its governing powers accordingly, it can never again boast of being the land of the free. And just as long as it postpones that day, just so long will it demonstrate it is no longer the home of the brave.

This is not vapid idealism. It is burning economic necessity. To continue as though living in the land of the open frontier and ever-widening horizon, to so order our physical actions, is, so far as awareness is concerned, to be dead. And death is stagnation—economic, social, or idealistic—any way you want to look on it.

Capitalism as we have used it has existed always as a constantly pressing means, progressing perhaps, bouncingly at times, never with an end or goal expressed in social terms in sight. It can be neither expressed nor related in any significant way to the fact of living. I might express it if I suddenly began running very fast and ran for a very long time without knowing where or for what I was running, if I made running the end-all of my life. But actually I reserve my running energy and use it only when it can be directed toward some specific end: It is a weapon I keep by me to catch trains, or to bring physical delight. The constructive powers of our capitalism are not in question. It has constructed a great deal. Much that it has constructed might not otherwise have been built. But I can think of any number of places I do not consider myself morally obliged to run to. The mere fact that the continuance of this capitalism is dependent upon the chance development of "something new", upon something beyond its own powers of control, condemns it as a mode of living for a close-knit social organism willing to call itself intelligent. Men have never been able to eat "something new" when it has not even put in its appearance. That is a power common only to the mental and not the physical sphere of American existence. If I were able to run only when pricked and had continually to look to High Heaven for someone to prick me, I should consider my power of running as neither useful, nor effective. I could not even call it my power.

The welfare of the Nation is irretrievably bound up in its industry. The continued running of that industry is its means to life. To say that that industry cannot be kept running effectively is stupidly to admit defeat. It is the method of running that industry that is at stake. Some of us have rather set ideas as yet as to the efficiency of that method. That method is the chaotic activity, will-less, stupid, undirected, of the amoeba. Unless that bounding energy can be channeled, directed into coherency, it will inevitably not only consume itself, but the very lives dependent upon it. Today it is crushing the structure of civilization it served to build.

* * * * * * *

No one will deny that its power to build was great. Its cities, its machines, are granted. The towers of its cities glitter in the sun. Take the lid off its cities, and the stink of human decay sickens the nostrils. Look upon this social tower. It is truly beautiful. Now look at the manure pile from which these proud towers sprout.

Look at the soil today: It festers. In the winter of 1933 more than one tenth the population was living on emergency relief, on grants of food intended to stave off only immediate disaster. Three million families are today existing under slow supervised starvation. The most conservative estimates report 500,000 families and more in terrible need to whom relief must be denied. This does not take into account one half to two thirds the remaining working population who are on part-time work. Many of these have been forced to accept wage payments below even adequate levels of average relief. They are, however, unable to obtain relief. To graduate into the world of charity dependence, one must first have earned the diploma of utter destitution. This new American standard of living is set at $200 a year. "We have been engaged in a great biological experiment in Illinois. We have been experimenting with the minimum amount of money and food that will keep people fairly healthy."[56] And that would be true the country over, save that the experiment is not always successful.

[56] Mr. Goldsmith, executive director, Jewish Charities, Chicago.

Travel quickly and superficially through some of the rich cities: New York is the richest in the land. At present it is supporting 108,000 families with tragic inadequacy. There are in addition 30,000 families, equally needy, whom it has been forced to turn away: "It is not a question of efficiency but of lack of funds."[57] Twenty-two thousand seven hundred and forty eight out of one hundred and eleven thousand one hundred and sixty school children examined were found suffering from malnutrition. There was an increase of 33⅓ percent of malnutritional cases shown between 1931 and 1932. In September 1931, 17,859 petitions for eviction were filed by landlords; in September 1932, the number was 27,387. Families are being driven into tenements declared unsanitary and uninhabitable 25 years ago. Its Hoovervilles are growing. Its garbage dumps and refuse piles are swarming. Its office buildings and homes are emptying. Its stores are swelled with food.

Look at Chicago: In 1930 families receiving relief numbered 16,500; 1931, 97,000; and in 1932 the figures boomed to 161,000; and all signs indicate a corresponding rate of increase for 1933. Cash payments for relief stopped early in 1932. In 1931 relief expenditures required only 52.4 percent of the amount for food; in 1933, 95 percent goes into food, not because more food is being doled. "Comfort, appearance, decency, or even school attendance are not primary aims of the commission", states the official report. "Milk is a luxury in most of the homes where black coffee and bread are always part of the diet", says an observer. Tenements built to accommodate 6 families now average 12 to 24. In 1 sample month it was found that, contrary to health regulations, 135 families had been cut off from city water supply. And the future? Expenditures for building in Chicago that in 1929 showed an index of 134.2 (1925–29=100) had declined by the end of 1932 to 1.8. In 1930 taxes were levied in Cook County on $12,206,000,000 of taxable property. On September 2, 1932, the owners of $5,734,000,000 of this had not yet paid. The date of delinquency was in June. At present 850,000 are unemployed. That is more than half the employable population. The wages in manufacturing industries—for those still retained—have sagged from 100.9 in 1929 (1925–29=100) to 28.5 in 1932. Twenty-eight cents is now received for what was $1 worth of work in 1929.

Cincinnati is a model city. It has diversified industries. It has not suffered as other cities have. It has one of the oldest community chests in the country. Today 15,000 families are on money relief. The heads of 6,000 more are on work relief at 2 days a week. The remaining 10,000 in distress subsist on grocery supply orders. These 30,000 families mean 20 percent of the population. In the first half of 1932 private philanthropies contributed 65 percent of the total relief, public tax funds the remaining 35 percent. In the second half of 1932 public funds were forced to supply 95 percent. Private charity was sucked dry. Now tax resources are exhausted. On Monday, January 2, all schools were closed to save one week's worth of teacher's salaries. But Cincinnati is well off. It has not the problems of the 1-industry towns to face like Toledo and Detroit. In the latter city 350,000 out of a possible 689,000 are out of work; recently 12,000 families, without investigation as to relative need, were automatically dropped from relief.

Take Pittsburgh, hidden beneath its fog of wealthy names and smoke: its average relief is 90 cents a person per week, while funds last. On February 1 the feeding school of 8,000 undernourished children stopped. Men are eager for work, even if payment is only by food order. But work relief is not working out, particularly in surrounding towns. Not because there is no work to be done. But because men are too physically undernourished to work, even a 6-hour day. One town of the area with a population of 33,000, one third of which, 2,000 families, is on relief, has been supplying amounts averaging consistently $5 a family per month. All wants for all families irrespective of size are to be satisfied at that rate. Nor is this an isolated case. In a neighboring coal-mining region, similarly "relieved", a miner pointed out that this sum enabled him and his family of 10, if they lived so extravagantly as to allow themselves 2 meals a day, to consume just one-half cent's worth of food per head a meal. Last year in Pittsburgh private resources raised $6,000,000; this year, after a persistent drive, $2,400,000 was reached.

The work-relief problem is by no means limited to the Pittsburgh area and stagnant steel-mill towns. The director of public welfare for West Virginia reports: "It has been absolutely necessary to extend direct relief to applicants to build their bodies up before they can work, and also to furnish them with clothing before they could go to work. That has been true in thousands of cases." In this State the standard of relief has averaged 70 to 80 cents per person a week: "The funds available both from Federal and from local sources have just been about sufficient to maintain the families and keep them from starvation—nothing except food, practically no clothing, and no rents." Medical aid has long since been abandoned, as have been, and are being, many families pressing for even their 70 cents worth of weekly relief.

Nor must West Virginia be thought of as being peculiarly daring in its biological experiments. The first Reconstruction Finance Corporation grants to Kentucky set up the standard of $1 a month for each family seeking aid. This was recognized as a miscalculation. The error was remedied. Kentucky families are now receiving "adequate" relief: $1 a week per family. Three schools have just been shut down because of trachoma laid to malnutrition. Tuberculosis and pellagra are on the spread. And now a new monster: "I might say", said Dr. Billikopf before the Senate Committee on Manufactures, "that in 1920, when I visited Poland and other contiguous countries, I came across this disease known as 'xerophthalmia', and in Germany as 'hüner krankheit', a disease which results in continuous blinking, due to lack of food, and subsequent blindness. I saw hundreds of such victims, and I can say to you that of all the devastating impressions made on me on my visit shortly following the war, nothing compared with the sight of children afflicted with this dreadful disease. I thought we were immune in this country, but here comes Dr. McCormack citing specific instances of xerophthalmia, found in Kentucky and possibly elsewhere."

Again, I emphasize, these States are not isolated cases, these cities stand well above the average. From the entire Nation just 116 counties, among them areas such as Salt Lake, Yellowstone National Park, and others not given to hearty appetites, did not send panic calls for Red Cross flour when it was distributed. The Red Cross is able now to meet only 20 percent of the Nation's need for cotton which factories won't produce. I am going at random. In the Pennsylvania coal-mining regions poverty has gnawed for a good many more than a mere 3 or 4 years. In whole sections, particularly in the Harrison region, miners have lived for months on end on nothing but Red Cross flour baked in a pan with water. One investigator, recently returned, reports this to be true of a community he visited: nothing but Red Cross flour during the last 3 months. All New England, holding, save for New Hampshire, aloof from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the pauper's oath, is fighting a losing struggle against starvation. Relief has merely served to stave off a series of threatening disasters: a few dollars for food may tide over a month's emergency, but when the months stretch into years, then the body just gives. It does not respond to that sort of emergency.

Private resources in Rhode Island are sucked dry. The textile regions are helpless. Lawrence, Mass., is bankrupt. Boston counts 20,000 women unemployed alone; 3,500 needing relief; 2,800 getting it at $4 a head per week. Connecticut standards vary. Stamford's rates run from $3 to $5 a week for groceries per family regardless of size. Bridgeport has no further funds for relief until April and is unable to borrow. Waterbury is unable to meet its demands for family relief; to date 337 families have been turned away. Men still listed as "employed" get 2 days' work a month at $2 a day. I ran into one family trying to meet an emergency operation and hospital bill at this rate. Connecticut labor standards have crumbled before the greed for cheap and cheaper labor. She shares honors with a handful of Southern States in showing an increase in child labor. Her sweatshops are rewriting the industrial history of a hundred years ago. Children have been found working up to 80 hours a week: where the trick once used to be pushing back the clock's hands now falsely punched time cards serve.

And so on into the Capital of the land. Washington is now, after continually threatening suspensions, spending $31,000 a week, each penny of it squeezed dry. While 8,000 families are on relief, another 8,000 have been turned away. The average family of four receives $3.50 each week to cover all expenditures. Which means 50 cents a day. Which means 12.5 cents a day per person, for all expenditures.

And what is the meaning of all this?

In the present apparently nothing. It does mean that in spite of the approval voiced from the White House acclaiming broad scientific social research, the testimony and advice of skilled social workers counts for nothing at all. It is because words and figures do not hurt. No one can make this real to himself, not even by repeating it slowly, lingering over the words: The slow, sure-working gnawings of semistarvation are destroying the health of a generation to come. That is unreal because it lies in the future: "You cannot feed children skimmed milk this year and make up by feeding them cream next year; what they did not get this year you can never make up to them."[58] No one, intellectually, would deny this. But the assumption has always been: Skimmed milk might do for one year; next year and all the years thereafter there will be cream. For 4 years that has been the assumption. In the meantime emergency relief has pressed millions into chronic poverty. Now relief is cracking. Further figures would do no good. In the bulk they mean nothing. They become dulled and blunt. More examples of what is happening could paint no broader, truer, more adequate, or more tragic a picture. The mind would merely refuse them. Cincinnati's and Kentucky's schools must stand for the 3,000,000 children today pressed from school either because of shut-downs, or for lack of decent clothing. Connecticut's children must stand for the 2,000,000 staging a nineteenth century pageant in factories today. New York's malnutritional cases mean tuberculosis and malnutritional anæmia worming its slow way under the health of the Nation. Fifteen million two hundred and fifty-two thousand unemployed. The figures knock at the mind but do not enter. They knock and pass away. It is the haunted eye that remains; one man alone blubbering, bewildered like a little boy; one scarecrow shivering on the highway; one listlessly dull face; one pile of furniture in a snowdrift; one piercing "What can I do?" It is the One that remains alive.

But what about the future, since the present can be ignored?

It is against this background that decisions must be made. I have not painted it because of a sentimental zest for social horror. I am not drawing a picture of hell the better to point my vision of heaven. I am not trying to imply evil minds in order to point out the need for beautiful minds. That has been the trouble. The situation has been regarded rather as the inevitable consequence of men's living together, the rich and the poor, than as an economic monstrosity, than as the logical result of cause and effect, than as something created and irritated by man's stupidity to be adjusted by his intelligence.

Stupidity may be the wrong word. A doctor would not be called stupid, today at least, who refused to apply his training, his experience, his scientific resources, to the curing of a disease, but insisted instead that the patient should first of all pray for confidence and hope and then wait for the conjunction of Mars with Saturn in the ascendent, which might or might not occur during the patient's lifetime; who, observing his patient in a fever, prescribed a concoction of fresh-minced toad skin, powdered baby's skull, and saliva, because these things being cool would most certainly draw away the heat, and furthermore were obviously remedial because sick men in the past had taken such cures and had afterwards recovered; who recommended starvation and opened a vein though the patient was languishingly weak and in need of simple nourishment; who then took his way, happy and content that he had done his best, to receive his customary fee from the apothecary, all the time praising the objectivity of science; who, when the patient died because of blood-letting and starvation, reproached himself for having overbalanced the proportion of toad skin in his remedy, and resolved next time to be more careful, still singing the praise of his science.

Our physicians have preached the necessity for confidence without knowing in what to place it, have looked for something to happen without knowing whether it might or might not occur; ignoring the body of the economic patient of whose condition the phenomenon of collapsing property values is but a feverish expression, they have prescribed a remedy of mortgage, bank, insurance-company, and railway loans, confident that they have struck at the source of the disease; ignoring bodily weakness, they have starved and let the blood of their patient with false economy; and, praising the value of scientific knowledge, they have not once turned to the equipment science has placed in their hands, nor sought to restore the energy and vitality of the economic body by allowing it to combat fever, nourished and strengthened by its own material resources.

What is there to rely upon?

(1) We have abundant productive forces, not only in factory and in field, but also in inventive power and in the vast reserve of physical energy that lies waiting to be tapped in the bodies of people.

(2) We have in the wants of our population, on the other hand, abundant, insatiable as far as we are concerned, desire.

(3) Coupled with desire we have poverty, poverty in the mass that makes it, now, impossible for this desire to be expressed in effective demand. American housing conditions rank with the worst in the world. Malnutrition has never been fully conquered. There is and has been on all sides an endless craving for more and better food, clothing, and housing, as well as for leisure and the opportunity to use some of the luxuries our machines can produce, the opportunity to even see what our minds can produce. Two thirds of this craving, however, gets an income in normal years of less than $2,000.

(4) On top of this we have excessive savings on the part of a small high-income group, savings that are sheer social waste and infinitely costly to the savers unless they are productive. This is what is known as overproductive capacity. It is obvious, however, that this productive ability is only, or primarily, excessive when defined in terms of a given market buying power. Excess savings are embodied in mills, factories, warehouses, fertile fields, and advertisement slogans. But as such they do not represent wealth. They are only potential wealth so long as they are idle. A railroad car carrying people or goods has value, not abstractly but actually; people and goods are paying their way. The car has value both to its owner and to those who use it when it is active. An idle railroad car is just so much steel and wood and will remain just so much steel and wood until it decays, no matter how much gold we pretend to dump into it to sentimentally maintain its active value. Value is only realized in terms of social use. Idleness will only serve to eventually consume all the wealth activity has produced. The savings of the rich have got to be used. More and more must be produced. More and more must be used.

(5) Self-evidently the one thing lacking is an effective market. We have in superabundance all the potential wealth we have ever had. Only our method of using it stands between. According to this method buyers are needed. They are the market. And absorptive markets alone can create wealth. All claims to wealth come to producers ultimately from their market.

[58] Grace Abbott.

The question is then: How get claims to wealth into the market so that producers, in order to produce, may get them out again? How was it done before? I am not going to run back through the last century of our history again. But obviously it was done through employment. That is the sole way the market can obtain its claims to wealth. Producers used their savings. They built. They did a great deal of building. And some of the building they did opened new sources from which claims to wealth could be obtained. And while there was new country to be built up, while there were old wants to be satisfied, new ones to be created, the process took care of itself with a certain degree of regularity. Preaching the high standard of living, rounding up cheap labor gangs abroad to keep it down, all moved ahead.

Immediately following the war there were new houses, factories, apartments, hotels, to stimulate the building trades with their starved yet effective demand. The boom in private construction was over by 1928, leaving 2 percent of the population in new houses. It is estimated that directly and indirectly because automobiles were built, 4,000,000 new jobs were opened. The radio, too, required its new factories, men to run them once they were built, required men to sell and to advertise them. And it in turn opened new fields of activity, new advertising channels, magazines, and the running of broadcasting stations. Recent Social Trends lists some 150 ways in which lives were influenced by the radio. The same story is true of the new electrical appliances. And all of these stem from the lucky accident that wages stood high at the end of the war. While building went on, wages served to absorb the products of things already built; but, in spite of mass-credit pegging, they never could support the increasing new burdens thrust upon the market they were allowed to represent. In a sense consuming power was brought into being only to be killed by the technic and abundance of productive capacity.

What is building? And what are wages? Building is continued in anticipation of future wealth. Wages are paid out while the building is in progress. They are paid before the facilities constructed are ready to produce or to serve. In other words, the wages paid out in anticipation of the sale of goods which have not yet been produced add to the demand for goods now being supplied without adding to the supply. The advance financing in anticipation of new wealth absorbs the old. It is only by maintaining a constant flow of claims to wealth to the present market. then, that productive facilities constructed in the past can reclaim the investment of money they represent. W. T. Foster puts it: "We get on only when the cost of preparing for future production is enough, in addition to the cost of current production, to give people the money they must have if they are to buy all the goods that are already ready."

So far, so good. Fate has been kind. It has provided enough new land, enough new wants, to stimulate employers to putting money into the present market with fair consistency. The social organism which this chaotic activity represented has continued to be moderately healthy. In other words, the key to every situation examined has been in the furnishing of claims to wealth to the consumer's market. This is true whether one looks at it sociologically or from the economic point of view. Consuming power in the hands of the individual is the key to richer life, his one key to any sort of life at all. Consuming power in the hands of the masses is the key to steady production and use of what otherwise is so much dead, inert matter. Consuming power is the key then to the security not only of the wage and salary earners but of owners, of investors as well. It is, in short, the key to all social wealth. It is the stimulation to activity that alone can give significance to value of any sort, whether it be expressed in land, in factory, or in securities. It creates the wealth of every man from farmer to bank president to Government Budget balancer.

The key then to effective economic control in a land where people will still insist on the right of determining for themselves what they wish to buy lies in the power to channel the flow of claims to wealth. This need not mean "Government in business." There is no reason it should want to run factories if it can be sure others will run them well and keep them running. What it does mean, for the present at any rate, is government in borrowing, government in taxation, government in public works—and in a big way.

And if the Government intends to be intelligent about it, it means most certainly a board of intelligent advisers in whose hands building and taxation will be given coherency, direction, and integration. The fantastic picture of a land starving itself because it has too much idle capital, too many idle hands, too many fertile fields, too many productive factories, is an absurdity that can no longer be tolerantly stomached.

* * * * * * *

What is America? America is the sum of its inhabitants. It is the total registered when 48 States with each man, woman, and child they contain are piled one on top of the other. The Government is the medium by which, in theory, this total expresses its will.

America cannot afford to go on strangling herself.

America cannot afford to go on forcing her inhabitants and consequently herself into the hopeless stagnation of chronic poverty.

America can no longer run the risk of allowing unchecked the sources of her claims to wealth, wages, and salaries to run dry; nor can she go far on the present trickle.

America cannot pay the price of restricted production.

America cannot hang herself by the rope of economy; she has succeeded in numbing the will to live of one fourth of her own body to date by so doing, and she is on the verge of utter self-destruction.

The Government can alone spend money. It alone has the power to borrow. If a war emergency should arise tomorrow, there would be no hesitancy on the part of the Government to borrow, to mobilize its credit, its natural resources, its productive ability, its manpower against the destruction of an alien foe. What does Government spending today mean? It means exactly what it would in the case of a private enterprise that borrowed money in the form of investments, and paid it out in the form of wages, materials, and costs of fabrication in the building of a plant intended to bring in returns in the future.

America can afford no longer to put off the day when she must invest in her own future. Supporting the burdens of the past has proved disastrous.

And if America chose to spend money on parks, on buildings, on gardens, on bridges, or slum destruction, on roads, national highways, reforestation, public employment agencies, the redistribution of the wreckage of industries of the past—on making herself a more beautiful, more desirable place in which to live—it would be fantastic to say she was destroying her own credit and her own wealth. She would not only immeasurably enrich herself; she would give new energy and hope to millions of inhabitants, listless and without hope today. She would be taking money out of one pocket where it is now idle and useless and putting it into another where it would be stimulating and effective. She would be creating new efficiencies for herself, laying down the roads to a new and more real progress and prosperity. If the balance on the books for the moment looked a bit lop-sided, that, as some one remarked, would be only a temporary optical illusion.

America's immediate task then is to enable her people, and therefore herself, to produce the wealth they are longing to produce. The idle factory falling into decay is no more stimulating a sight to the employer than to the employee. Both are for the moment helpless. Nor does the idle factory contribute much toward budget-balancing. The Government is the only business enterprise today that can spend in anticipation of future wealth. Factories will not and cannot run without buyers. The national debt today is less by $5,000,000,000 than it was at the end of the war. To declare an emergency, to launch a mobilized campaign against the fantastic nightmares of destructive economic forces is just as much within the Government's power today as it was in 1917. To continue rooted in stagnancy means inevitable decay and terrible suffering for those asked to go foremost. To act * * * there is no real choice. And factories when the wheels are spinning produce consumers as well as goods. It is within the power of the Government to produce a few consumers first.

* * * * * * *

And the future?

We must step back and give integration to recommendations.

What was sought was an equilibrium of outlets: The outlet for surplus man-hours into leisure; the outlet for goods into an absorptive market. For markets to be absorptive claims to wealth are constantly necessary; a directing of potential recipients of claims to wealth from old source to new source through interlocking employment agencies is thus seen as an economic as well as a social necessity; and finally a directing of the flow of claims to wealth in itself through borrowing and taxation resulting in timely public building and important Government research and service jobs establishes the need for a permanent board of Government advisers, if the equilibrium is to be maintained.

The key underlying all this structure is the key of constant consumption.

It was with that in mind that public employment agencies are urged. As constant sources of new information; linked with universities as they are now in Minnesota, the significance of their constructive ramifications is endless, depending on the skill with which they are handled in each community. But their immediate economic significance lies in that they will hasten the flow of essential consumers between source of wealth and source of wealth.

It was with that key in mind that the principle of the 6-hour day, 5-day week was urged.[59] It is an experiment hazardous and impossible for one producer to adopt. But its relationship to the whole is immediately established when it is looked upon as creating new sources from which wealth may be poured into the consumer's market. As in the case of employment agencies it, too, contains infinite social ramifications.

And, finally, it was with that key in mind that immediate Government spending was urged on a new Liberty Loan scale; to preserve the equilibrium once established that the economic advisory council was set forth.

All bear an inherent relationship to one another. One would be almost meaningless without the other. There is obviously one remaining gap. I have not dealt with the principle of unemployment insurance before this, partly because its immediate establishment would be impossible, partly because it is dependent upon the previous erection of public employment agencies for effective administration.[60] And I bring it in here because it plays an essential part in the automatic adjustment of consumption power to production capacity.

[59] "The 6-hour day and the 5-day week are methods of distributing the loss of jobs in a less inequitable fashion."—R.S.T.

Fluctuation in industry will continue: "The technologically unemployed are a changing aggregation of individuals, and a solvent unemployment fund would do much to mitigate the distress which many now suffer before finding new openings." That, coming as it does from Recent Social Trends, at least carries with it President Hoover's assurance that it is far from a mere emotional plea. Unemployment insurance is as much for the welfare of the community as it is for the individual covered by it. Flow in purchasing power must be maintained. Unemployment insurance assures a certain minimum below which retail trade cannot fall. It will therefore be one of the duties of the council, acting through the system of employment agencies as centers for distribution of benefits, and as checks on the sincerity of applicants in their desire for work, to erect a system of unemployment insurance whereby Government, industry, and workers shall guarantee to themselves and to society at large further economic security.

The burden on industry? The Ohio State Commission on Unemployment Insurance has estimated that if in 1923 the State law had been passed, the fund would have produced $50,000,000 a year by a charge of 2 percent on the employer, 1 percent per employee, on the total pay roll. There would, at the beginning of the depression have been a reserve fund of $100,000,000. During the years 1930 and 1931, $180,000,000 would have been distributed as against the $25,000,000 actually given out in relief. Had a 4-percent charge been used as the basis for calculation, rather than the 3 percent, a fund would have been reserved to last through 5 years of depression. When one considers the effect the distributing of this fund would have had on retail dealers, on banks, and on landlords in such times of depression, its significance is self-apparent. The burden on industry amounts to less than 1 percent of the cost of production.

The main obstacle in the way of its adoption is prejudice. The method of administration, once action has been decided upon, presents no difficulties. No subject has been more investigated or studied. Neither industrialist nor wage earner is responsible solely for unemployment. No one industry alone can be expected to care for its unemployed. The matter is the concern of society at large. It is for that reason that contributions should come from employee, employer, and the Federal Government. Only so can the risk be evenly distributed. And particularly should the upper income levels be reached in its support. Enough has been said elsewhere to relieve us here of the necessity of dispelling once again the illusion that leads one to depend either upon voluntary or local action.

Prejudice is the main enemy of unemployment insurance. Prejudice, before a terrible demonstration, is rapidly being swept away. This much is obvious: wages afford no security; relief is not only degrading but inadequate; no country has suffered so severely in depression as America; no country leaves its workers so completely unprotected. Yet the dole is still spoken of with contempt. England's economic depression, ignoring the reality of her dependence on world trade, is blamed on the dole. The Republican administration encouraged this mistaken conception. In conclusion let England, after a generation's experience with unemployment insurance, defend herself, paint a true picture of what such insurance means in times not only of severe depression but of normal industrial advance.

The following is taken from the final report of the committee on industry and trade, quoted from Epstein's work. The committee was appointed in 1924. It was headed by Sir Arthur Balfour. The final report was made in 1929:

"We regard the establishment of a practically universal system of compulsory insurance against unemployment as one of the greatest advances in social amelioration made during the past generation.

"On the broad question of the merits and value of the unemployment-insurance scheme as a whole, both from the point of view of general social welfare and also from that of industrial and commercial efficiency, our opinion is that the scheme has amply justified its establishment. In normal times it provides a much needed method of enabling a worker to safeguard himself against the worst evils of industrial fluctuations. For the individual to provide such a safeguard by means of his own thrift is of course impossible in view of the incalculable character of the risks to which industry is exposed. Nor do we think that any basis of insurance is really satisfactory, short of one which covers the whole field of industry, or at least the principal industrial groups, inasmuch as any narrower scheme would effectively check mobility as between insured and uninsured occupations. That work people should by some method of insurance be safeguarded against the worst risks of involuntary unemployment is, in our opinion, a very great advantage, not only to themselves, but to the trades which they follow. For nothing is so detrimental to industrial capacity and morale as long-continued idleness without sufficient means of sustenance. The employers' contributions to the unemployment fund represent a negligible addition (averaging much less than 1 percent) to the total costs of production, and we are satisfied that, on the whole, the resulting advantage to them has very greatly exceeded any burden of this kind.

"How the country would have fared had not the insurance machinery been available in its time of need, we find it difficult to imagine. Throughout the last few years it has been a matter of constant comment that so deep and prolonged a trade depression has produced so little actual suffering in comparison with the experience of far slighter and more transient periods of depression before the war. There has been practically no decline in the consumption of the essential necessaries of life in spite of the fact that a million or more workers have been earning no wages at their trades. For this happy result, a large part of the responsibility undoubtedly rests with the unemployment-insurance scheme.

"Has the task been performed too well? Has the removal of so much of the terror of unemployment relaxed the will to work? It is often lightly asserted that this has been the case, and the experience of the United States, where no such system is in existence, is frequently cited in favor of the view that Great Britain has artificially increased the burden of unemployment by the measures taken to diminish its hardships.

"So far as any conclusions can be safely deduced from the very partial data available, it would seem to be that the volume of industrial unemployment in the United States has of late years fluctuated more violently and rapidly than in Great Britain, and also that the average percentage of unemployed persons in American industry has been at least as high as in this country.

"It cannot be said that the figures of industrial unemployment in the United States give any support for the view that the mass of unemployment in this country is to any material degree the result of the measures taken for mitigating the resulting hardships and could be appreciably reduced by discontinuing those measures."[61]

In brief, the final verdict of England, looking on the misery that now reigns in America is: "What would we have done without it?"

Further sermonizing is unnecessary.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have previously tendered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]. I am informed by the Chair that my amendment is inappropriate, in view of the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Washington had been previously accepted and was closed as to the matter of amendment thereto. Therefore I offer an amendment to place at the end of section 3 of the bill the provisions of the amendment which I had tendered. I ask leave to propose an amendment, at the end of section 3, after the word "effective", being the last word of the section, that there shall be added the words "nor shall this bill and its provisions apply to perishable products of livestock, poultry, milk, or their products." Later I shall explain the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in opposing the bill I would not have it thought that I am not a strong believer in what is known as the "share the work" movement. I do not believe that in any community has that movement been carried farther or with greater success than in the Pittsburgh district, particularly in the steel mills. Today every effort is being made by alternating days of work to provide some work for all of the regular employees of that industry although the industry itself at the moment is operating at something less than 20 percent of its capacity.

[60] The passage of the Wagner bill since the first writing of this report changes radically the immediate importance of unemployment insurance. Had an employment service worthy the name been in existence at the time of writing, unemployment insurance would have received far more space and emphasis than is given it in this report. The relation of such a service to any insurance scheme is well stated in Isador Lubin's summarizing of the Senate's inquiry into unemployment in 1929: "The condition that the unemployed workman must make application for benefit in the prescribed manner is the very core of the scheme. He is required to register at the employment exchange the fact of his unemployment. The exchange knows or is able to ascertain whether his unemployment is due to lack of work in the establishment in which he has been engaged. It is able to find him work in his own occupation in other establishments in the district if vacancies exist. It might even help him to obtain employment in some other part of the country. The employment exchange thus controls the payment of benefit. It administers the test which qualifies for benefit. The unemployed workman, when he presents himself at the exchange, may thus be offered either new employment or unemployment benefit."

[61] This discussion of unemployment insurance is totally inadequate, for reasons stated above. The best accounts of the subject may be found in three recently published books: Standards of Unemployment Insurance, by Paul Douglas; Insecurity, a Challenge to America, by Abraham Epstein; Insuring the Essentials, by Barbara M. Armstrong; more briefly, in Harry Laidler's pamphlet, Unemployment and its Remedies; and in Mary Gilson's Unemployment Insurance.

The question involved here, however, is whether Congress, by a pretended exercise of its constitutional power to regulate commerce, shall adopt a prohibition of commerce in articles which have their origin in factories, workshops, or whatnot, where any individual has been permitted to work more than 6 hours in 1 day or more than 5 days in 1 week.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is not required by the bill that the object thus prohibited from going into interstate commerce should itself have been the product of longer hours of labor than are allowed by the bill, but every article from that particular establishment is embargoed from interstate shipment if it be that one individual on one occasion has worked longer than 6 hours a day. Think of the absurdity of that; and yet that is the language of the bill itself. If it so be that some clerk, trying to catch up with his work in the office, has worked 6½ hours a day, then everything made in that great plant in which that clerk is employed is prohibited on the face of the bill from being shipped across the State line.

The Supreme Court has already told us in Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U.S.) that it is unconstitutional for Congress to attempt to prohibit commerce in articles made from forbidden child labor.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am wondering whether the inhibition would not also apply to the person who owned that particular business as well as to the clerk as in the instance cited by the Senator from Pennsylvania? It seems to me it would apply to any person and would prohibit the owner of the business himself working more than 6 hours in his particular line.

Mr. REED. I think that is true.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] suggests sotto voce that it was before the "new era" that Hammer against Dagenhart was decided. I have the highest respect for those Justices who now comprise the Supreme Court of the United States and I should think that I were something wanting in that respect if I were to vote for this bill on the assumption that they intend to ignore the decision of their own Court in Hammer against Dagenhart. It is just as important that the law should be settled as it is important that it should be settled right. I have the utmost confidence that the Supreme Court as it stands today is going to declare this bill unconstitutional if it passes: First, because of the fact that we are undertaking here to regulate production and not commerce. The rule in Hammer against Dagenhart says that that is an unconstitutional attempt. Second, if we had all the power over production that is enjoyed by a State legislature, without any constitutional restrictions except those in the Federal Constitution, I say that even then we could not validly limit the hours of labor as is attempted to be done in this bill, and for authority on that question I cite the familiar New York Bakeshop case.

Mr. BLACK. O Mr. President!

Mr. REED. I am aware of the Oregon case, which has come since. There the decision was based on the fact that it was essential for the protection of the health of the workers of Oregon to limit them to hours of labor that were somewhat much more liberal than are proposed in the pending measure. I do not believe that the Court would say that it is within the police power of any legislature to limit the hours of labor in all industry to 5 days a week and 6 hours a day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it is so essential in order that the measure may be made ready for the consideration of the Senate to submit the report on it now that I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will yield to me to report the so-called "agricultural relief bill."

Mr. REED. I think it is highly appropriate that that should be done at this time. The bill pending will pretty nearly extinguish the last gasp of industry, and the bill which the Senator from South Carolina is about to report will do the same thing to the farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report favorably, with amendments, the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, and I submit a report (No. 16) thereon.

I hope Senators who are interested in the bill will take advantage of the opportunity before we meet in the morning to read the bill and prepare themselves for its consideration, because I want to expedite the measure as much as possible.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the apparently humorous allusions of my friend from Pennsylvania to the pending bill——

Mr. REED. I spoke more in sorrow than in humor, Mr President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And to the agricultural relief bill may produce merriment, but I think every Senator here must realize that there are conditions pertaining to both agriculture and employment that should prompt and stimulate every mind in the Senate to some action calculated to work a change in the conditions that for many years have been prevailing and which have been gathering force. We know that there are millions of men out of employment; that this unemployment has been brought about by factors which are more or less permanent in their influences and effects. The object of this bill is to spread employment, so that some of the millions——

Mr. REED. The Senator from Arkansas is speaking about the bill now pending?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. REED. Will not the Senator allow me to finish? My time is limited.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will conclude in a moment. I am not willing, Mr. President, to sit here and hear these great measures made sport of by Senators who have done little or nothing and who propose little or nothing to bring about changes in the economic system that is wrecking both industry and agriculture in this Nation.

Mr. REED. Very good. Mr. President, if it shall be considered making fun of a bill to point out its absurdities, I am going to continue to disappoint the Senator.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the few minutes left to me, I propose to point out how the pending bill is unfair to the laboring man himself.

Imagine, if you will, Mr. President, the feelings of a workman who perhaps has just recently found a job after having been idle for a year who reads in the newspapers that the American Congress, without consulting him, has cut down his earning power, say, 25 percent in the job that he needs so desperately. "Has cut down his earning power," I say, because obviously he is not going to be paid the same for working 6 hours a day as for working 8 hours a day. How many American workmen are there in times such as these who do not consider it a privilege to have 8 hours of steady work in a day? How many of them want to drop their tools and go home at the end of 6 hours to a family already inadequately provided for? How many of them want to substitute 2 hours of idleness for 2 additional hours of work? How many of us limit our work to 6 hours a day?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. REED. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania ever play golf? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I do not.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this bill is equally unfair to American industry. Imagine yourself, Mr. President, the head of a factory in New Jersey or Rhode Island or eastern Pennsylvania, already having tremendous difficulty in competition with cheap foreign labor, already up against competition with Belgium and Germany and Czechoslovakia, whose wage rates are so low that they would scarcely keep body and soul together here, and which are sending us goods with which we are having a terrific time to compete. Imagine the feelings of the manager of a mill along the Atlantic seaboard who is told that he has got to go on a basis of four 6-hour shifts a day, and that he is expected, as several Senators have said here, to pay as much for 6 hours as he has been paying for 8 hours. How can he compete with cheap foreign labor under such an additional handicap?

Finally, Mr. President, I say that the bill is utterly unworkable. Let me give the Senate some illustrations to prove the truth of that statement. Take a blast furnace in which iron is made; take a chemical pulp mill, as to the details of which the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] can testify; the operations must be continuous in those and many other establishments. It means, therefore, a 4-shift arrangement, each shift working 6 hours. But suppose when the 6 hours of work have been completed, and each man is expected to drop his tools and go away, his place instantly to be taken by his relief, the relief does not get there, as very often happens. The street car is late or the relief has fallen ill and does not show up at all. What happens? Either this proposed law must be violated and every product of that factory be embargoed or else the blast furnace is utterly ruined and burned out. What alternative is there? Suppose the electrician of the plant has worked for a full 6 hours and during the night a short circuit occurs. The practice at present is to call him out of bed and get things fixed right away, but under this bill those operating the plant would not dare do that; they would not dare even to make emergency repairs; they would not dare to substitute for a sick man by asking his predecessor to remain at work.

Those are just some of the familiar instances of the day-to-day work in factories that would be rendered utterly impossible by this bill. And when it becomes necessary to divide the 30 hours and try to divide up the week in an enterprise involving continuous employment it will be found that in order to keep the mill going 24 hours a day all week—and that has to be done in the production of iron, because blast furnaces know no Sundays—5 shifts will have to work 30 hours a week and 1 shift 18 hours a week, and how can anyone in the United States live on present wage rates when he is working only 18 hours a week? Heaven knows some men are trying to do it now because of the shortage of work, but their families are well-nigh starving.

Take the superintendents and the clerical force and the accountants. Can there well be four shifts of such employees? How can a plant have four superintendents succeeding each other throughout the day? Yet this bill covers superintendents just as much as it covers common labor. For that reason, I say, Mr. President, that in practice the bill is going to be utterly unworkable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. REED. I have almost finished, Mr. President, but I will speak on the amendment.

The effect of this bill is going to be either one thing or the other; it must necessarily be that it will either raise the cost of production of manufactured articles or else it will lower the wages of those engaged in the production of such articles. There can be no other alternative.

Mr. WHITE. Perhaps it will do both.

Mr. REED. Perhaps it will do both; but certainly one or the other will be the result. And how can Senators explain to their farmer constituents, who themselves are in such desperate straits at the present time, that they are passing a bill here that is going to raise the cost to the farmers of every manufactured article they purchase; and if it does not raise the cost to them—and I think it will—then inevitably it means at least a 25 percent reduction in the day's earnings of the factory laboring man? How can Senators explain that to the workman?

Mr. President, we never yet got ourselves out of a depression by loafing; we have only gotten out by hard work. As the Senator from Oklahoma says, this may be "a new era"; but there are some principles that still remain true. The law of gravitation is still with us; the law of supply and demand is with us; the law of thrift is with us; the law of hard work is with us; and that is the only way we are going to get out of the present depression.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD at this point a telegram which I have received bearing on this bill.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., April 5, 1933.

HON. DAVID A. REED,
The Senate:

Black bill (S. 158). Manufacture of steel, particularly blast furnaces, is a continuous operation, working 3 shifts of 8 hours each per day and 6 hours a day 5 days per week would so split up working hours that total number of men would get less earnings, and unless rate of pay is reduced would add at least 25 percent to labor cost and make it easier for foreign competitors to ship goods into the United States. To meet foreign competition would require either higher tariff or reduction of earnings nearly equal to that of Europe. This surplus of labor will only continue until this depression is over and then there will be in all probability a shortage of labor. We must strenuously object to this bill.

HOMER D. WILLIAMS,
President Pittsburgh Steel Co.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and Mr. LEWIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not wish to address myself to the pending amendment; I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask that the pending amendment may be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland, which is now pending, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Following the amendment offered by the Senator form Washington [Mr. DILL], and heretofore agreed to, it is proposed by the Senator from Maryland to insert:

Newspapers and periodicals are not included in the description of the business activities herein designated.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I merely wish to state, as I said on the floor yesterday, that the descriptions in the bill do not include newspapers and periodicals. I do not see how anyone could by any stretch of the imagination construe those descriptions to apply to newspapers and periodicals. Of course, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask that my amendment be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, at the end of line 10 in the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert the following:

Nor shall this bill and its provisions apply to perishable products of livestock, poultry, milk, or their products.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beseech the courtesy of Senators while I present to them such explanation of this amendment as has been presented to me by those from whom I accept it and in whose behalf I tender it with a complete consciousness of the justice of their request.

The amendment, which has been adopted, presented by the able Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], to come in on page 2, line 9, after the word "day", reads as follows:

This section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce, fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character.

Senators, let me not disguise the fact that it is the packers of my city, whose very large undertakings have become, of course, one of the great industries of the community, which I have the honor in part to represent, whose enterprises will be affected by the amendment.

I have not been in accord politically with the masters of these great products. We have not been in harmony in local or State contests. Frequently we have had many antagonisms, in which I have not always been successful. I am sure, however, no Member of this honorable body would assume for a moment that because of my political conflicts I would not present with as much fairness as possible to my conception of the complete justice their demands which they present as necessary to equity and right in their behalf.

They contend that this exemption which is given to the canners from the far Northwest should apply to them. They point out a matter with which I am not so familiar otherwise than to present it to you as it is presented to me—that in presenting the foods to the country there comes a time when those around them will offer, whether it be milk, or, in the immediate surroundings, the products of poultry, milk, vegetables, and meat, in large quantities, which they can immediately purchase and immediately prepare for a demand which they say may at once be very great. They assert that if they are compelled to obey the bill literally they cannot work long enough, or let their men who are specialized in the particular task work long enough, to put the products in such marketable shape that they may be at once transferred to the demand necessary to the consumption. They say that if they are compelled to abide by the bill and are not allowed under those conditions to take advantage of the situation as it will be presented, they will be prevented from buying from the farmers around them; that the farmers would not be able to sell to them. The packers would be conscious that they would not have time enough to turn the substance into such shape as is necessary for consumption. Therefore the packer would not buy the products from the farmer. The farmer in these surroundings would lose his market; and the packer would lose the market of those who sought to consume, because there would not be the opportunity to put the products in such shape as would enable them to be sold. In addition, it is said that the products, being perishable, must be acted upon at once, for, failing to be acted upon at once, they perish in their usefulness.

Furthermore, it cannot be said that an increased number can be put to work, and therefore by that means the plan of the bill can be carried out. Much of the work is particularly specialized. It must be done by men who have been educated and skilled in the art. They alone can do it. To attempt to bring in others merely because the number is accumulated would bring in those who were not skilled in the art or capable of executing the work.

Next, if they stood in this emergency, where they had a chance to buy from the farmer and sell to the consumer and did work overtime, as set forth in the bill, they would become at once criminals under this bill and could be prosecuted.

Lastly, they could not ship the product to any States around them, because the bill would prevent the shipment though there were ever so slight a time consumed in addition to that permitted by the bill in getting the matter out for the call of the consumption which they say could be upon them at each particular time.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell me what are the hours of work in the packing industry?

Mr. LEWIS. I am told that they are able to keep their men at work now 40 hours a week. The men arrange that among themselves. The system is adopted by the men themselves, under their labor-union regulations.

Mr. WHEELER. How many hours a day do they work?

Mr. LEWIS. It depends. Ordinarily they run from 6 to 8 hours. It depends on the men themselves. They work in shifts, I am informed, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. The reason why I ask the question is this: We had some difficulty in Montana because the packer in Montana employed union labor, and the big packers shipped their products in there; and the contention of the labor unions there was that some of the big packers who were shipping them in were nonunion, and worked their men as long as 10 hours a day, whereas in the competition in Montana the packer there was only permitted to work them 8 hours a day.

I am not aware of the facts; but I wanted to ask the Senator whether or not that was true, because if the packers in his State are working their men 10 hours a day at the present time it seems to me that is entirely too long a time for them to work. I do not see any particular reason why, in the packing industry, they should not work their men 5 days a week and 6 hours a day the same as any other manufacturers, because of the fact that they can so arrange their business, if they have to, the same as any other manufacturer does.

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator from Montana by saying that I have no knowledge of the matters transpiring in Montana, the State so ably represented by himself. I only can inform him that as to the State where I live, the laborers there with whom I am acquainted in their methods arrange their hours practically among themselves, by regulation; and that regulation, either by the direction of the union in conjunction with the employers, or by agreement among themselves, results in adjusting their hours between themselves by consent, and that is adopted by the packers. Such is my information. Therefore, the burden intimated by the Senator from Montana, which would have applied in Montana, has no application to the city of Chicago and to the facts concerning which I am now presenting this amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I think perhaps I did not make myself clear to the Senator.

There was a boycott against any product produced by the packers in Chicago, against the sale of their articles in the stores in Montana, because of the fact that they employed nonunion men, and likewise because of the fact that they worked longer hours; and it was said that the packing house in Montana and the butchers there could not compete with the packing houses in Chicago because of the fact that in Chicago they worked the employees these long hours.

Mr. LEWIS. I gather the suggestion now. It is said that the competition there in Montana could not continue because of the method which was adopted in Chicago?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I may say to the Senator that I am informed that that condition does not prevail; but, to the contrary, that the hours are adjusted among the men to their own satisfaction, and matters exist in such harmony that there is no controversy between the men and the employers. I would know if there were any conflict, but I am assured by those who represent the situation and bring this matter to my attention that there is no conflict and that the hours of work depend very largely on the men themselves. Wherever the men themselves feel that the emergency is such that they should continue in a different manner than that previously regulated by their own arrangements, they adjust that among themselves. That is what I am able to tell the Senator, but the exact details of which I am unable to reveal.

I now conclude, as I imagine the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] would like to address the Senate. I now say to you that there is presented to me, and I present it to the Senate, a matter the details of which I can only give in part of my knowledge. As to the remainder of the matter, I am instructed that they desire that livestock, poultry, milk, and their products be exempted from the heavy provisions of the bill, in order that they may avail themselves, wherever they can, of obtaining the livestock and turning it as quickly as possible into marketable products, lest it perish, and serve the consuming market at its demand. Second, that as to poultry and milk and their products, they ask to have the same application made. I present it as a matter arising from the necessities of their situation and because they feel that it would aid the farmer from whom they purchase, would aid the consumer to whom they sell, and give them opportunity to continue this work and increase the market.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I am in favor of this amendment. I am not speaking for the packers, but rather for the livestock men.

In the stockyards it is customary to have what are known as gluts and shortages. Some days there are thousands of livestock on the market. Other days the number is very small.

Until livestock is purchased by a packer the expense of keeping that livestock in the market—for feed, yardage, and so forth—is borne by the producer. There is also a great shrinkage the longer the livestock has to be kept. If the packer is not equipped to take care of that livestock, the livestock will remain in the stockyards at the expense of the shipper. He will have that expense to pay, and also the shrinkage on the livestock.

So this amendment is not so much for the benefit of the packer. He can pass his costs on to the shipper; but it is for the benefit of the producer and shipper of livestock.

I think the same thing is true of poultry; and, therefore, if this amendment should be approved by the Senate, I believe it will really help the producer and not the packer, as Senators might be led to believe.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Would the Senator's amendment remove from the provisions of this bill the packing industry?

Mr. LEWIS. Not at all. I have heard that intimated, and I am sure it is under a misconception.

Mr. WALSH. Would it remove that part of the packing industry which has to do with housing, caring for, and protecting cattle before they are slaughtered?

Mr. LEWIS. In nowise whatever. They are under separate acts, both of Congress and of local legislation, complied with literally, and in nowise touched by the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. So the packing industry would not be in any way exempted from the bill?

Mr. LEWIS. Not as an industry in anywise whatever. These particular matters which I pointed out, and expressed concern with regard to, are limited only.

Mr. WALSH. I was prompted to make the inquiry because the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] said he was not speaking in the name of the packers and in the interest of the packers, intimating that the packers were concerned in the matter.

Mr. LEWIS. That was largely due to the fact that I wanted to be perfectly frank with my colleagues, who have been very generous to me, and oftentimes have extended honors much beyond my deserts. I did not know all of the conditions of the packing industry, and the gentlemen representing it had brought to my attention the injury to the trade which I am the Senate representative of to the extent of being one of its legislative representatives here in the legislative body on legislation affecting Illinois and its industries. I wanted the Senate to know exactly that it was from the representatives of these gentlemen that I get the information; I wanted them to know from whom I got it; also, that I did represent their interests here; and I wanted it manifested clearly that that is for what I spoke—the interest so far as it affects the consumers in the general market and the public in its behalf.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Wyoming, asking the Senator to keep in mind that my time is being consumed.

Mr. CAREY. I want to say, in answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the expense of caring for the livestock is borne by the shipper until the packer purchases the livestock.

Mr. WALSH. Are there not, in the yards of the packers, men employed to feed and take care of and protect the cattle until they are slaughtered?

Mr. CAREY. The packer would not buy the livestock until they were ready to be slaughtered.

Mr. WALSH. So that in the yards the control of the cattle is in the possession of the producer or seller?

Mr. CAREY. He would have to pay for the hay and feed and yardage.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield the floor to the Senator from Alabama. I am trying to find a copy of my amendment, and I find that I have not it. I added the amendment at the end of the bill because I found I had been cut out of the Dill, or first, amendment in previous prints by the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I oppose an amendment offered by my good friend from Illinois, particularly on account of the fact that I realize that his vote is found and his voice is heard in the interest of the people of the country when he talks on questions in this body.

It is my judgment, however, from a study of the amendment, that it amounts to exactly the same thing as it would to add a proviso stating that the packing industry is exempted from the stipulations and provisions of this bill. It is exactly the same thing as it would be to provide that those manufacturing or dealing with cotton should be exempt from the provisions of this bill. That, of course, would exempt the cotton factories. If we were to provide that those manufacturing anything from ores should be exempted, that, of course, would exempt the steel mills. What this amendment does is to exempt from the provisions of this bill those who handle livestock, poultry, milk, or their products.

The farmer raising the livestock is not included in this bill at all. The dairyman handling the milk is not included in this bill. What this amendment does is to designate those agricultural products handled by packers, and to state that the provisions of the measure shall not apply to these products. Of course, it would be exactly the same thing to say that the provisions of the bill shall not apply to the packers.

There was an amendment agreed to with reference to this bill on yesterday with reference to perishable products. Someone might ask the question, Why agree as to some, and not as to others?—which is a very reasonable inquiry.

Those with reference to which agreement was made on yesterday are those where the work must be entirely seasonal, the goods are of such perishable nature, and, in addition to their perishability, the time for doing the work is so short that we must make exceptions to the general rule. The packing industry, however, works 12 months in the year, and I am very frank to state that this amendment would strike out a part of the very heart of the measure. What reason is there why those engaged in the packing industry should receive any more consideration than those engaged in manufacturing cotton cloth or woolen cloth?

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I do not think it is fair to compare cotton and meat. Cotton is not a perishable product, it costs little to store; but when livestock goes to the market it has to be kept and has to be taken care of, and unfortunately at the expense of the shipper.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct, it has to be kept; but I am informed that the people in the stockyards work now on the basis of a 40-hour week. It is probably true, as the Senator suggests, that the particular packers who have spoken to him do work their labor 40 hours a week. I know that some of the others work their laborers more. But, assuming that they work 40 hours a week, if it is true that there should be an exception made of the packers, how could they do their work in a 40-hour week? They could work perhaps 60 or 75 hours a week because of an emergency.

The exceptions which were made yesterday referred to perishable commodities, where the work must be done quickly and rapidly within a period of a few days. They referred, for instance, to the fishing industry, where, according to the information given us, the fishermen go out on the sea and while there they can the fish. Naturally they cannot work continuously, but the packing industry can work 12 months in the year.

As much as I dislike to differ from my good friend from Illinois, I cannot see the slightest reason or excuse why the packers should be singled out for particular favoritism under a rule which is to be applied to give added employment to the people of this Nation.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, it not infrequently happens that there are a large number of livestock on the market in the early part of the week, but that the number is small at the end of the week. Under this bill the employees of a packing plant could work only 6 hours a day, consequently the packer would purchase only the number that he could kill and dispose of with his force.

The Senator spoke about the milk and cream business. This act would apply to cooperative creameries operated by farmers. I do not see why we should make an exception of the fishing industry and not make an exception of the meat industry.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, as I explained a moment ago, if the packers were compelled to go out onto the high seas and were compelled by law to fish a certain number of hours and were then compelled to can the fish they caught within a certain period of hours the analogy would be perfect; but the analogy is not present at all in the case of the packers.

I have been in packing institutions. There is one located in the State from which I come. But they work the year round. It is not a seasonal work; it is not work which requires that something must be canned within 10 hours. It is a case where the stock comes in and is slaughtered. The pending amendment would not help the farmer. I deny that it would add one dollar or one dime of profit to the stock farmers of this Nation. It would not increase the profit of the man engaged in agriculture. It might help the packer to give him the right to have his employees continue to work as they are working now. The packers constitute one of the industries of this country which, according to the evidence, are working long hours and are not preserving the reasonable rules and regulations that would be required to give employment to the people of this Nation who are now unemployed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know much about the packing business, and do not know what their hours and what their customs are. I do know that a large class of them are engaged in interstate commerce, and if they receive large shipments of cattle on any given day, assuming that this bill should apply to the employees, the 6 hours of any employee or any group of employees might end at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and there might be a carload of cattle there to be loaded or unloaded or cared for. What would happen in that case? Would the stockyard be required to put on another shift of men for 2 or 3 hours to handle that carload of cattle? Assuming that they have definite quitting hours, we will say at 6 o'clock, and a carload of cattle were in process of being unloaded at 4 o'clock, and the group of men working had worked 6 hours up to that time, what would happen during the next 2 hours? Would they have to stop proceedings until the next day, or put on a new shift of men to unload that carload of cattle, which work would require 1 or 2 hours? How would that work out?

Mr. BLACK. The same thing would happen that happens now. If it be true that that business is of a fluctuating nature, and that more stock comes in one day than another, they have provided an adequate number of employees to meet that situation. The only result would be that, as in the cotton factory, or the woolen factory, or as in any other business, instead of having just enough men to do the work who work 8 hours a day, they would have enough men employed who could do the work by laboring 6 hours a day, to meet the situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I can understand that in a factory where everybody goes to work, we will say, at 8 o'clock, and everybody quits at 5 o'clock, or, under this law, would have to quit at 3 or 4 o'clock, they would just shut up shop and everybody would go home. The machinery would close down, the machines would be silent and still until the next morning, when they started to work again. But when a carload of cattle comes in and has to be looked after, it is a little different from closing up machines or locking up a building and everybody going on home. I am just wondering how it would operate. I am not interested in any packer. I understand that the word "packer" has an odious implication sometimes, in the minds of some people.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think it should have.

Mr. BARKLEY. It does not carry any implication to my mind, and therefore I do not hesitate to pronounce the word. But we know that it is not a business, especially the stockyard end of it, that can start at 8 o'clock in the morning and stop at 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon, or at 6 o'clock in the afternoon. If cattle do come in all the time, they have to be looked after. The farmer or his agent may be there to be in charge of them, but he has to put them in the immediate charge of the stockyard hands who are trained to handle the care and feeding of the cattle until the following day, or until some definite time when they can be slaughtered. Information is all I am seeking. I am wondering how the bill would work out in a case like that.

Mr. BLACK. Assuming the statement of facts which the Senator has set forth, it is my judgment that, very much as they have now, they would have enough men to handle the job working 6 hours a day.

If that were the situation to be reached, and the Senate were given the privilege, by an amendment offered, to pass upon it, it would be entirely different; but that is not the amendment. The amendment goes farther. The amendment exempts from the provisions of the bill those who are processing perishable products or livestock, poultry, milk, or other products. What does that mean? It means that the packers would be exempted, because that is all they deal with, and the case the Senator has in mind is not here offered. This is an amendment which exempts entirely the packers. If someone wants to offer an amendment which would raise the sole and single proposition, then it would be up to the Senate to vote on it. But I simply desire to call attention now to the fact that if this amendment is adopted, we might just as well write into the bill a provision that the packers are exempted.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not arguing for the packers.

Mr. BLACK. I understand the Senator fully.

Mr. BARKLEY. But I do contemplate a situation where any stockyard might have a hundred men there all day doing very little; but they would be on duty, would be employed. Late in the afternoon a carload or two of cattle might come in that had to be moved at once, and if those men, already on the job all day, had served out their 6 hours contemplated under this bill, that carload of cattle would have to be untouched until the next day, or until a new shift of men were put on to take care of them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, would the Dill amendment take care of the situation?

Mr. BLACK. I think the Dill amendment would, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that some States now limit the hours of labor. How could they work under those limitations? It is merely a question of what hours are fixed.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois cheese factories and butter factories, and factories producing products of that kind, would be excluded.

Mr. BLACK. They would all be excluded, because those things are all to be exempted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will ask, have I time remaining on the bill and some time on the amendment, and as to which do I have time, or do I have time yet on both?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may speak only once on any amendment. The Senator may speak on the bill now.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I address myself to that to which I may speak under the parliamentary situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I want to adopt the argument of the able Senator from Alabama. From my conception of logic I can conceive of no reasons quite so obvious and imperative to support this amendment I have presented than the argument that has just been given us by the versatile and distinguished Senator from that eminent Southern State.

Let it be conceded that in the amendment spoken of as the Dill amendment the provision is, "This section shall not apply", referring to the very section which I ask to be amended, "to commodities which a cannery, workshop, or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce, fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character."

Now, says the able Senator from Alabama, the distinction lies in this, that men go fishing, they have a certain length of time to do that fishing, and the fish must be caught and then canned and prepared for market. But my able friend forgets that at one season of the year it is one kind of fish, at another season of the year it is another kind of fish, and thus it continues to be another kind of fish. But they are working all the time at the fish, and they are canning different kinds of fish, but it is the same constant canning, it is the same manufacturing for market or commerce. The seafoods, fruits, or vegetables are given this exemption because they are of a perishable character, says the able Senator, but the packing business goes on all the time. Yes; but a calf becomes a cow in part of the time. Also the young chicken becomes an older one—if gentlemen are experts on any form of chickens; I make the allusion parenthetically; I do not like the knowledge being displayed by my eminent colleague on that question. [Laughter.] But I call attention to the fact that in the packing industry it must avail itself at the seasonal time—the farmer whose poultry comes in while it is young, the milk must be handled at the time when it is marketable and usable, and the stock, to which the Senator has referred, must be handled when it can be used, for the time comes when it may be unmarketable.

Therefore the very doctrine which applies to the amendment, which the Senate accepted upon the theory that it is perishable matter and to be used quickly and put in commerce as early as is convenient, is capable of application to the amendment which I presented. It disturbs my eminent friend because it is an effort to do justice to the packers. It would seem that much of justice due the packers in behalf of what they produce or what they are to sell as products should be denied them because they are called "packers", while the very same things under similar conditions are granted to those which are called "canners." In other words, the policy of my able friend is to can the canned stuff for the Northwest, but "can" the packers in the Middle West. Of that form of "canning" I do not approve. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have presented the reasons for the amendment. I have alluded frankly to political controversies, but those have nothing to do with the justice that is due the packers in their desire to produce their products and their desire to be protected upon an equal basis with others. I am only asking of the Senate the very exact rule that has been applied in behalf of other similar occupations. I respectfully insist that the eminent Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] have presented arguments so cogent and so unanswerable in behalf of the amendment which I have submitted that I can add nothing to them.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think my friend from Illinois is in error as to what we have done in the adoption of the Dill amendment. As I understand it, his amendment is not in line at all with what we did with regard to seasonal packing. The Dill amendment provided that—

> This section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character.

This is a perishable product, of course. What the Senator from Illinois probably refers to is the next clause of the Dill amendment, which reads:

> Provided further, That upon the submission of satisfactory proof of the existence of special conditions in any other industry included herein, making it necessary for certain persons to work more time than herein provided, the Secretary of Labor may issue an exemption permit in respect to such persons, relieving the commodity from the provisions of this act.

The second clause is broad enough, I believe, that if there is any justice in any particular claim made for the packers, the Secretary of Labor is empowered to give whatever relief they may need. In other words, in the case which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] presented, if the Secretary of Labor finds such a condition to obtain, a permit may be issued to facilitate the unloading of cattle or anything of that kind. But if we draw a blanket around the packing industry we might as well put the steel industry and the clothing industry in too, and be through with it. If we are going to exempt the packing industry entirely from the operation of the 30-hour week law, then we might as well exclude the steel mills and the clothing factories and be through with it. In view of the last clause that has been adopted, which permits any particular condition to be met by the issuance of a permit from the Secretary of Labor, I certainly hope we will not exclude the packing industry and the slaughterhouse business from the operations of the bill, because if there is any one business, judging from my limited experience, that does need to be under the provisions of the bill, it is the slaughterhouse business, and if there is one institution able to bear it it is the packing-house industry.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I take the privilege of submitting a few remarks on the bill. I cannot vote for the bill because, in my judgment, it is unconstitutional as the law is today, and I believe that is the opinion of all the lawyers I have heard express an opinion about it. If the Supreme Court does not overrule previous opinions it would be forced to declare this bill unconstitutional. As highly as I regard the opinion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I cannot go along with him and say that I will vote for a bill that is unconstitutional today so that the Court may have another opportunity to determine the question. I think I am bound by the decision of the Supreme Court which makes such legislation unconstitutional.

But aside from that I do not believe that it would be wise to deal with only one unit of the several that go to make up the business in this Nation. Everyone must realize that in every business there are three things which we must consider. One is the earnings of labor. The bill proposes to deal with that. Another is the earnings of capital. Another is profits that may be derived from business. If we take only one of those things and attempt to legislate about it, the legislation must prove a failure. If the bill, or a bill having similar purposes in view, accomplishes anything it must deal with the earnings of labor, the earnings of capital, and profits. Otherwise it can accomplish little, if any, good.

The bill deals with hours of labor. The purpose is to give jobs to a greater number of men. There is no one who can say that wages can be maintained; that is, that the employer will pay as much for 6 hours each day as for 8 hours each day. There is nothing in the bill that would enable anyone to state with any degree of certainty that wages would not be reduced in the same proportion that the hours of labor are reduced. If that should be true, the purchasing power of the people would not be increased at all.

There is another thing that we must consider. If the employer today is unable to conduct his business because he cannot earn enough, it goes without saying that he cannot absorb the increase in the cost of labor if the cost should be increased as a result of the bill. Then if he cannot absorb the increased cost, it must be passed on to the consumer, or it must be deducted from profits, and if there are no profits then it is imperative that the price of the thing produced to the consumer must be increased in the same amount that the money paid out for its manufacture has been increased.

Then it seems to me if we are going to deal with this subject in a way that will bring about such a result, it is absolutely essential that we deal with all three things. If we say that hours of labor shall be so many per day or week, it follows that someone must have the power to fix the hours of labor. If we say that the earnings of capital shall be fair, then it follows that someone must have the power to determine what is a fair earning for capital. If we say that each business is entitled to earn a profit, then someone must determine what that profit shall be. Without taking into consideration all of these three things—and that is all there is to business—without considering all of them collectively and looking at them at the same time, we cannot accomplish very much good.

It is very much like this: We have an old machine. It has done very well in its time, but someone, let us say my good friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] conceives the idea that we ought to have a new machine and a better machine. He goes out and creates one piece of it, as he has here, and says "I will put that one piece, that will belong in the new machine, over in the old machine." It will not work there. The result will be that not only the piece will be destroyed, but the old machine itself will be destroyed. If we are going to install a new machine to regulate the matter of capital and labor and profits, we ought to complete the machine, because just one new piece will not work in the old machine.

Mr. President, I make these few suggestions because I want my position understood. I doubt somewhat the wisdom of such legislation. We are now going through a great period in an effort to get rid of what we call legislative interfering with the lives of the people and the rights of the people. Many have said that we have no right to say what a man shall drink or what a woman shall drink. We have submitted to the people of the Nation an amendment to the Constitution taking out of it that provision which sought to prohibit men from drinking certain intoxicating liquors. But now we are proposing by this legislation to take away from men a much more valuable right—in fact, one of the most valuable rights that a man can have in a nation such as ours—liberty of contract. We are saying to him, "Although you may be willing to work longer hours, although you may need to work longer hours, you shall not make a contract with your fellow man to labor longer than a certain number of hours." We are dealing with a very sacred question. I do not think it should be dealt with in a haphazard way. I do not think we should take up an important matter like this and pass it for no reason other than to give the Supreme Court of the United States an opportunity to say whether such legislation is constitutional.

Mr. President, I am not opposed, I may say to the Senator from Alabama, to legislation along the line indicated in his bill if it will cover the entire subject in such a way that business may be carried on with fairness to everyone that is interested. We cannot simply deal with one side of the triangle without dealing with the other two sides. Then I think the bill has many imperfections in its general terms as it is expressed and as it appears in the report of the committee. I happen to know of one industry down in my State that the bill would utterly destroy, and I expect there are many other industries in the same situation.

I refer to the production of a road-building material called "rock asphalt." I want to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to this particular method of operation. There may be 500 men engaged in producing rock out of which to manufacture rock asphalt. We will have 50 men who are experts in the distribution of that rock. They can look at it or feel it and know whether it is of the required richness. We have only about 50 such experts, and those 50, working at the same time, can keep at work 500 common laborers each day. When those 50 men stop work, when they have worked their 6 hours, and the 500 common laborers have worked their 6 hours, they all must quit. The company could go out and get 500 common laborers to break up the rock, but it cannot go out and get 50 experts to distribute the rock, so the plant must shut down at the end of 6 hours. There is no way for it to put on another shift.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator evidently is not familiar with the amendment which was adopted yesterday.

Mr. LOGAN. Possibly I am not.

Mr. BLACK. That is very natural, because for some reason it was not printed and laid before Senators. Under that amendment, the company which the Senator has in mind, if it has experts whose services are necessary for a longer time than 6 hours, can obtain a permit from the Secretary of Labor. I am sure that provision will be very liberally administered. It was to meet that exact situation and similar situations that the amendment was adopted. So, insofar as that feature is concerned, it would not deprive the company there from doing business.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad to know that. In some way or other I overlooked that amendment. I did not find it among the printed amendments. I assumed that all the amendments had been printed; but I am very glad to hear what the Senator has stated.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I will simply make this statement: Even if I should consider the bill as necessary, and that its enactment would serve a useful purpose, I would be compelled to refrain from voting for it solely on constitutional grounds. If it is unconstitutional at the time I vote, then, having taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, I cannot vote for the measure.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I believe I know the Senator from Kentucky well enough to state that he favors the humane principles underlying this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true. I favor all humane principles that will help improve the conditions of labor in fairness to those who own and control the capital and to the great mass of the people at large.

Mr. LONG. The constitutional objection arises because of a 5-to-4 decision.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true.

Mr. LONG. That decision, in the Dagenhart case, may be said to stand in the way; but, fundamentally, the Senator from Kentucky and all of us must vote as we interpret the Constitution. There have also been many unanimous decisions.

We, of course, are persuaded by what the Court has held to a certain extent; but there are many decisions of the Supreme Court which would uphold this bill that were not 5-to-4 decisions—as, for instance, in the oleomargarine case, in the lottery case, and in the monopoly case—all of which sustained the right of Congress to prohibit products from being transported in interstate commerce if manufactured by a monopoly or in aid of a lottery or anything of that kind. If we base our constitutional opinion upon decisions of that kind, there would be nothing in the way of our conscience in voting for this measure—or, rather, we would be justified in doing so.

Mr. LOGAN. It may be that my training throughout the years has caused me to think along lines from which I cannot easily depart. I cannot agree with the Senator from Louisiana that we have the right to place our own construction on the Constitution when the Supreme Court of the United States, which is solely vested with the authority to tell us what the Constitution means, has determined a particular question. It may be that we could say that we disagree with its opinion, but however much we may disagree with the opinion of the Supreme Court, that opinion is right. It may not have been right 5 minutes before the opinion was delivered; it may not have been right during the entire history of the Nation up to that time; but the very moment that that opinion is handed down and goes into the law books, when it becomes final, then the Constitution means and must mean exactly what the Supreme Court says it means. I can place no other construction on it.

I am in sympathy with any legislation that will make for the betterment of mankind. We need to do something to prevent the concentration of great wealth in the hands of the few; we need to protect the rights of the people. It is always necessary to protect the rights of the poor and the helpless; the rich are able to take care of themselves; but, in doing so, we should not transgress upon the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution is not merely an instrument of direction. There is nothing in it that is directory. Every time the Constitution speaks it breathes a command. When it says, "Thou shalt", you must do that which it says, and you cannot substitute anything else. When it says "Thou shalt not", then you must obey, for it is not an instrument that can mean one thing today and another thing tomorrow. Occasions may arise when it is necessary to find new meanings in the instrument, to find a dormant or latent power which has never previously been called into operation; but the Supreme Court has spoken on this question; it has said that if we pass this law it is an unconstitutional act.

I grant that the Court may change its opinion and say that it was wrong in its prior construction of that provision of the Constitution, but until the Court does say that we are bound by it, or, at least, that is my opinion about it. Of course, I am the keeper of no man's conscience; any other Senator is free to look upon the matter according to his own judgment; but, as for me, I am bound by the decision of the Supreme Court until it shall be changed.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, it is my hope that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] will prevail. I am greatly interested in the advancement of the pork- and the milk-processing business, and the pending amendment directly affects the welfare of the people of Iowa.

The packer has no way of determining how many hogs will be in the stockyards for him to buy or to take care of on any one day. It simply depends upon the number that are gathered there, either trucked in or shipped in. If we impose on them a limitation such as is proposed by the bill, we are simply going to add to the burden of the overhead. If the packer bids on the hogs which may be there with the idea that he can carry them over for a day, he will deduct the expense of the carry-over from what he pays the farmer. I think there can be no question about that being the practice in the marketing of livestock all along the line; and it seems to me that the circumstances bring this particular form of activity clearly within the rule laid down when we exempted the canning business.

Referring now to the milk situation; they have what they call big days and small days in milk deliveries. On some days there will be collected twice as much milk as on other days. If the processor was restricted to a limited number of hours, he would be compelled either to put on twice the help that he should have on one day and have no help at all on the next day or he would be compelled to work overtime. He cannot always tell what quantity of milk will be delivered.

Therefore it seems to me, as to both the creamery business and the livestock business, this amendment ought to be agreed to, and I hope it will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. BLACK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been called for. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will reread the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed by the Senator from Illinois, on page 3, line 9, after the word "effective" and before the semicolon, to insert the following:

Nor shall this bill and its provisions apply to perishable products of livestock, poultry, milk, or their products.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, this amendment is designed to accomplish the same thing that was accomplished by the adoption of the amendment with reference to canneries?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator states the position I take.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama what, in his opinion, is the objection to the amendment in view of the fact that we have accepted the amendment exempting canneries?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I stated a few moments ago—I imagine the Senator was not present at the time—that my objection to this amendment is that if we are going to exempt the packers we ought to do it by name. This amendment as it is written absolutely exempts the packing industry from the operation of this law, and that, in my judgment, should not be done. It would exempt them for the reason that it names specifically the commodities which they handle which are perishable. It says that those dealing in such commodities shall be exempt from the provisions of the bill.

There is a vast difference between a business running from month to month throughout the year and the business of canning, which involves frequently but 2 weeks, and no more, during which the canning must be done. There is a vast difference between that kind of a business and a business of the packing companies which have cold-storage plants and are amply able to take care of everything they have. The cannery, of course, to which the amendment of the Senator from Washington applied to the processing, for instance, of tomatoes which grow during only a short season and the canneries must work rapidly, but the pending amendment deals with the packing of meat and exempts the entire packing industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], and under the circumstances withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. I do not know how he would vote if present. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STEIWER (when his name was called). Referring to my pair, which was announced upon a previous roll call, I cannot learn how the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] would vote. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] are necessarily detained from the Senate; also, that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are detained on official business.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 44, as follows:

So Mr. LEWIS' amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point the telegrams which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., April 5, 1933.

Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD:

Urge you use best efforts to secure exemption dairy products in Senate bill 158, dealing with hours of labor in factories.

JOHN BRANDT,
Land O'Lakes Creameries, Inc.

ST. PAUL, MINN., April 5, 1933.

Hon. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD,
Senate Office Building:

We urge you use every effort to have dairy products out of Senate bill 158.

TWIN CITY MILK PRODUCERS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment which I think is in a sense clarifying, and in no degree in conflict with the original purpose of the bill. In fact, I have undertaken its preparation at the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], in consultation with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Connecticut, who are interested in the same point.

It was not originally intended that the bill should apply to executives and supervisory officers in a business. It would be manifestly impossible to stagger general management or to stagger superintendents or to stagger private secretaries.

Mr. NORRIS. That will not be so difficult in a few days. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Well, using the word in the technical sense, the statement still remains. Therefore, in order to make it clear that the objective is fully covered, I am suggesting that, on page 2, line 7, after the word "person", the following language shall be added:

except officers, executives, superintendents, and others in supervisory capacities, together with their clerical assistants.

I am inclined to believe that none of this group was ever intended to be covered within the legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Michigan offers the following amendment:

On page 2, line 7, after the word "person", insert the following: "except officers, executives, superintendents, and others in supervisory capacities, together with their clerical assistants."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I simply desire at this time to call attention to the fact that on January 28, 1933, I made a statement in the Senate with reference to this bill, and said that in my judgment there would necessarily be some exceptions which would have to be made. Unfortunately, those who were interested in these exceptions did not bring them before the subcommittee, so we are compelled to work out the matter in this way on the floor.

I desire to state that in my judgment an exception of this kind should be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan if he thinks that commodities made where the owner of a factory himself works longer than 6 hours would be prohibited from being transported in interstate commerce.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should think that an operating owner would be included within the exemption of the language I have just submitted.

Mr. WALSH. I had assumed that the Senator would make that answer. Now let us assume, not unreasonably, that a small cigar factory in Maine—and I know of such factories—ships cigars to Boston, Mass., and that there are 1 owner and 3 employees, and they decide to make themselves into a partnership of 4 partners. Clearly, those men could work over 6 hours a day, while the single owner who had to employ three men would be obliged to limit the employment of his men to 6 hours a day; would he not?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I would not undertake to answer the Senator with respect to his interpretation. In any event, however, the situation is more favorable, I should think, in the light of the pending amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator; the amendment is most helpful, and I approve of it most heartily, but I am afraid that we have not yet succeeded in eliminating an owner or a proprietor or partners who may be disposed to work longer than 6 hours a day. The case I have in mind illustrates that.

Mr. CLARK and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

I am in sympathy with the general purposes of the Senator's amendment, but as I heard it read it included an exemption of anybody in a supervisory capacity. Now, a machinist is a supervisor over a machinist's helper. A bookkeeper is a supervisor over an assistant bookkeeper. It seems to me that by the use of this language we would exclude from the operation of this act thousands and thousands of working people.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. After the word "executives", I move to strike out the comma and insert the word "and"; and after the word "superintendents", I move to insert a period and strike out the remaining two lines, the balance of the amendment, leaving the amendment to read as follows:

After the word "person", add the following words: "except officers, executives, and superintendents."

Mr. President, that would mean this: We have one amendment already that allows the Secretary of Labor, on proper showing, to exempt anybody or any industry. In any case that deserves exemption, the Secretary of Labor is already vested with that authority under an amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]. Under this amendment as I have moved to amend it we would create a further exemption which the Secretary of Labor could have made anyway—officers, executives, and superintendents. If, however, we allow to stand here these provisions with reference to those who are in a supervisory capacity and their clerical assistants, I should judge that out of a thousand employees there would be no difficulty in working seven or eight hundred of them.

For instance, if I am cutting wood, I am the major woodcutter. I sprinkle the coal oil on the saw. I would supervise my assistant. If I am a printer, and I am the man who picks up the type, then the devil under me, of course, would be under my supervision.

Mr. NORRIS. Fine! [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. I am speaking about the printer's devil. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to state that I had not read this amendment at the time it was offered, but immediately upon the statement I read it. I believe that it goes farther than the Senator from Michigan desires, and I think what he is after will be reached by agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. I believe the word "supervisory" is of such an uncertain nature that not only would it be unwise to put it there because of those who might be included but on account of the uncertainty of the language, it might affect the legality of the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The language to which the Senator from Alabama takes exception was borrowed from a suggestion that I obtained from the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN]. It did not occur to me that it had within it the breadth which obviously does exist.

I have no desire or disposition to open a back door to this bill. I should be perfectly willing to eliminate the additional phrase in respect to "supervisory capacities", but it seems to me that the phrase in respect to "clerical assistants" should remain, for this reason:

I do not think a man should be expected to have a separate private secretary the last 2 hours in the day, and I do not think it is practicable to expect him to have an extra stenographer the last hour of the day, because that sort of service necessarily is personal and continuous.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Alabama, I see no particular objection if we leave in it the clause as to the clerical assistants of the officers and executives and superintendents. I will withdraw the amendment as I have offered it, therefore, and I will offer the amendment to read as follows——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I ask permission to perfect my amendment by eliminating the phrase respecting other supervisory assistants. How does it read?

Mr. LONG. I suggest that the Senator perfect his amendment by striking out, after the word "executives", the comma and inserting the word "and"; and after the word "superintendents", eliminate the words "and others in supervisory capacities." That would perfect it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, there is nothing in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to distinguish between the private secretary of an executive officer of a big corporation and the thousands of clerks and stenographers that are working in these big offices.

In Chicago, at the end of the day, thousands of young men and women pour out of those offices, all a part of the clerical staffs of railroad companies and big organizations in that city. That is true in every great industrial center in this country. Unless some of this language is eliminated, or the meaning made very plain, we will remove from the scope and effect of this bill all of the clerical assistants in the hundreds of big offices in this country.

If we want to vote for this measure with the understanding that we are removing from it all the clerks and stenographers, let us be very certain that we vote on it with that in mind.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Michigan is willing to insert the words "and their personal and immediate clerical assistants"; and we think that will cover it.

Mr. BONE. I think perhaps that would cover it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then I submit the amendment in this form; and I will read it myself, for fear somebody else might not succeed.

After the word "person", on page 2, line 7, add the following words:

except officers, executives, and superintendents, and their personal and immediate clerical assistants.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to propound a question to the Senator from Michigan. Did I understand the Senator to say in offering this amendment that it is impossible to stagger management?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think, Mr. President, that management is already staggered, and is calculated to be further staggered.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if this measure passes, the Senator will find, and I think the Senate will find, that management can be staggered.

I have but one suggestion to make, however, in the way of amendment. I think we ought to amend this bill with a provision that it can be cited as "the Black Act," and I say that without any reflection upon its deserving author, whom I hold in the highest esteem.

Mr. President, the black death, I believe, is the most devastating plague that ever scourged the human race. Yet destructive as it was the black death was not so bad as it might have been. It destroyed only about 40 or 50 percent of the people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I desire to call from the desk an amendment which I have offered to the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 5, after the word "mill" and the comma, the Senator from Maryland proposes to strike out the word "cannery", so as to read:

That no article or commodity shall be shipped, transported, or delivered in interstate or foreign commerce which was produced or manufactured in any mine, quarry, mill, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States in which any person was employed or permitted to work more than 5 days in any week or more than 6 hours in any day.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, just a brief word. This amendment would exempt canneries wholly from the operation of the bill. I am quite aware of the fact that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] in part covers this situation, but it is not at all satisfactory to the canners of my State. The canning industry being one of the large industries of Maryland, I therefore ask consideration of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. LONG. A point of order. We have already perfected that language by the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]; and that amendment having been agreed to, it is not subject to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland is to part of the original bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not want to delay a vote. I hope and believe that the Senate will vote down the amendment very promptly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement I made earlier in the day, I withhold my vote. Were I permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I do not know how the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] would vote if present.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. Not knowing how that Senator would vote, I shall withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STEIWER (when his name was called). By reason of the pair previously referred to, I am compelled to withhold my vote. Were I permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] are necessarily detained; and that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. LEWIS. Let me announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. That Senator is absent and asked that I announce the fact.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 43, as follows:

So Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I propose an amendment as follows: On line 8, page 2, to strike out the words "5 days" and to insert in lieu thereof "36 hours", and on line 9, to strike out the word "six" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "eight."

The effect of this amendment would be to increase the maximum limitation on the hours of labor to be permitted under the bill from 30 hours a week to 36 hours a week, and the maximum limitation on the hours a day from 6 to 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 8, to strike out the words "5 days" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "36 hours", and on line 9, to strike out the word "six" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "eight", so as to read:

That no article or commodity shall be shipped, transported, or delivered in interstate or foreign commerce, which was produced or manufactured in any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States, in which any person was employed or permitted to work more than 36 hours in any week or more than 8 hours in any day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I just wanted to inquire of the Senator whether the amendment he proposes now is being offered at the request of President Roosevelt?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I could not say that it is being offered at the request of the President. I think it would be acceptable to the President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. My reason for asking is that I wondered whether it was a part of the President's program.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not make that statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think I should make a little further explanation of the amendment. There are many who are in sympathy with the primary purpose of the bill who believe that the reductions of the hours of labor carried in the bill are greater than ought to be provided for at this time. It should be conceded that the effect of the amendment in one respect would be to diminish the number of additional persons who might be employed under the limitations provided by the bill. But it is my thought, Mr. President, that the reductions which will be carried if the amendment should be agreed to would be very substantial and might prove adequate for the purposes of the sponsors of the legislation. If the constitutionality of the bill should be sustained and its operation proves as helpful and as advantageous as those of us who are supporting it hope that it will, further reductions may be hereafter made if the circumstances seem to require or justify it.

The expansion of the limitation of the maximum hours per day to 8 is without doubt a substantial increase, but it affords a greater leeway to industry for adjustments with respect to the time their employees shall work.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I dislike to see an increase in the number of hours provided in the bill, but I realize how close our vote is here in the Senate. I want to ask the Senator from Arkansas this question. Eight does not divide exactly into 36. That would mean that there would be a 4½-day week, would it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; they could work 4½ days at the maximum limitation, or they could work 6 hours per day for 6 days.

Mr. LONG. I would suggest an amendment to the Senator's amendment, that the "36" be made to read "35" and that the "8" be made to read "7."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not know of any especial difficulty with regard to the 36-hour limitation except that it permits of shifts more readily than would 35, but the difficulty about changing the 8-hour limitation to 7 hours suggests itself in that there is no multiple of 7 that would make 24 hours. If circumstances should require the operation of an industry full time with 3 shifts of 8 hours each or 4 shifts of 6 hours, that could be done under the amendment as I am proposing it; but it would be much more difficult if the maximum limitation were reduced to 7 hours, as I am sure the Senator will readily observe.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. I followed the reading of the amendment presented by the Senator from Arkansas, and I want to be clear as to one thing. The amendment returns to the 8-hour day. I am not for the moment considering the week. The intention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], as I followed him very closely in his very eloquent address the other day, was to provide for a 6-hour day. The amendment eliminates the 6-hour day and goes back to the 8-hour day and, of course, limits the hours so far as the week may be concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator will permit me, I think the Senator is in error when he states that we would go back to the 8-hour day by the adoption of the 8-hour limitation. I am not aware of any legal limitation that is applicable to the industries of the country. It has been stated on the floor that in some cases the hours of labor now in some shops and in some industries are very much greater than 8. I have heard it stated 12 and even 16, but the greatest number of hours that anyone could work in any industry under the amendment proposed would be 8 instead of 6 as proposed by the bill. The maximum number of hours anyone could work during 1 week would be 36 instead of 30 as proposed by the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas a further question? Does he not think his amendment changes the entire philosophy of the bill as presented by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no; I do not. I have stated that it permits of a greater freedom in the operation of industry. It does increase the hours of labor above those that are contemplated by the bill; but the thought in the minds of many, as I stated in the beginning, is that it is not desirable to make so radical a change at once in the regulation of industry as is contemplated by the bill, but that it would be better to make some change in the nature of that which is proposed in my amendment and try it out. If the constitutionality of the measure is sustained and if necessary, or if the circumstances require, we can make further reduction. I do not believe that the 8-hour limitation on work is oppressive to any worker. I do not think that the permission to work, if given, 8 hours during any one day would be burdensome to labor. Of course, the object of reducing the hours to 6, as proposed in the bill, is to broaden the spread. As I have already stated, admittedly more people could be employed if the bill is retained as it is now before us, but the question is whether it is too great a burden to place on industry at one time.

There is one further thought. It has been stated over and over on the floor today, and I believe was particularly commented on by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], that in the event the bill passes there will certainly follow corresponding reductions in wages. The proponents of the bill do not anticipate or intend that shall result. It is far more likely to occur if we retain the figures in the bill than if we modify them as provided for in my amendment. I have now stated all that I care to about the amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he concludes?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator's amendment limits the hours per week to 36?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. From the manufacturer's standpoint it is much more difficult to work 4½ days than it is to work 5 days of either 6 or 8 hours per day. If we start a plant to operating for half a day, it is much more difficult than if we started to operate a whole day. I do not like the amendment because it contemplates a 4½-day week.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It contemplates just this: Any adjustment within the weekly limitation might be made so that the laborer does not work on any one day more than 8 hours, or in one week more than 36 hours. A man might work 8 hours today and then 7 hours a day for 4 days, or he might work 6 hours a day for 6 days, the 5-day limitation not being provided for in my amendment. The effect of the provision is that a man cannot work more than 36 hours in a week and no more than 8 hours on any one day.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I want to call the attention of the Senator to one suggestion. The shifts would be 3 instead of 4 within the 24 hours. Under the bill as it now stands there would have to be 4 shifts within 24 hours. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas three shifts would be possible so that any corporation would have to have only 3 experts or 3 groups drilled to carry on the work during the 24 hours. Is not that correct?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is correct. It permits a greater leeway in the operation of an industry.

Mr. SMITH. What I am driving at is that, knowing some factories as I do, there would seem to me to be almost an impossibility of getting four shifts within 24 hours competent to carry on the work. The Senator's amendment would reduce it to three shifts. Those of us who are acquainted with the nature of certain work will readily recognize that it would be a pretty difficult matter within 24 hours to get four shifts. Some of the mills are now beginning to run night and day, the full 24 hours. Under the contemplation of the bill as it now stands, it would require four shifts of workmen, and it would be almost impossible, it seems to me, for any one factory to employ skilled labor sufficient to carry out that purpose and operate the factory at 24 hours.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there is no purpose on the part of the sponsors of the bill nor on the part of anyone who favors its provisions to do injustice or wrong at all to any industry whatsoever; but the amendment which has just been presented, it strikes me, entirely metamorphizes the bill and presents a philosophy at variance with that which originally was presented when the bill was argued in the early stages before the Senate. I am in sympathy with the bill as originally presented, prepared and ready, desirous, and enthusiastic in that desire, to vote for it.

In the bill that was presented we altered what had been the course of conduct in the matter of labor, and altered it in accordance with the well-known and recognized desire and design upon the part of those who have been directing labor in this country for the past few years. All of us remember how the long struggle went on year after year, year after year, for an 8-hour day. We all recall the final success of those who were struggling to make hours of labor comparable with 8, and how finally in many industries the change was won and we changed them in some instances concerning public work. In many States it is recognized law today that 8 hours shall constitute a day's work upon State construction and the like.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] then adopted the new philosophy because of the crisis in which we find ourselves and provided for a 6-hour day and a 5-day week. That, as I understood it, was the purpose of the measure as originally presented, to change the basis of the daily hours of labor that had been ours in the days gone by and to provide shorter hours. In order that there might be more jobs and in order that we might bridge over the chasm that now confronts us and now imperils us, we provided that we should have a 6-hour day and a 5-day week. That was the great bone of contention originally. I may be in error in thus ascribing to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] the purpose which I do ascribe to him, but it was with some of us the great desideratum.

Now we return, with the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], to the 8-hour day, and we return not to what was existing before but to a 36-hour week. Divide it as we may, if 8-hour days shall be the work of those who are in industry, they can have but 4½ days' work per week under the amendment. It may be said that they do not require to work the 8-hour day; but, of course, the design of the amendment, I assume to be, is that it shall be permissible, of course, to work the 8-hour day, and thus relax what is thought to be the rigidity or the drastic character of the measure. It may be essential, I do not know; but the amendment does alter the original philosophy of the bill entirely. Instead of the 6-hour day now we are providing for an 8-hour day. So instead of a 5-day workweek the amendment would provide possibly for a 6-day workweek. If that be the design of the Senator from Alabama and those who are the progenitors of this measure and have worked so hard upon it, I think it ought to be stated, and that we ought to go forward upon that theory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the Senator knows that if the maximum limit were used there could not be a 6-day week.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; not if the maximum were used.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the maximum limit were used, there would be a 4½-day week.

Mr. JOHNSON. I so stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has just stated that the amendment contemplates an 8-hour day and a 6-day week.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps I should have added that if the 6 hours be utilized as a day's labor it will be a 6-day week; if 8 hours be utilized as a day's labor, then it will be a 4½-day week. So we now have a measure that is not of the character of the original measure that was submitted, and we are changing entirely the philosophy of the particular enactment. To this some of us object.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield the floor to the Senator, if he desires.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to inquire of the Senator from California, if this amendment is based on the theory that it will preserve the present situation, is not that subject to the exception that where men are working by the day and receiving wages by the day and are reduced from 6 days to 4½ they will have their wages reduced, although those who are paid by the week might continue at their present wages?

Mr. JOHNSON. I should think that might be likely.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield the floor, as I think the Senator from Nebraska wishes the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think we ought not to forget that one of the principal objects of this proposed legislation, as I view it, is to help the country and the people of the country get out from under the terrible depression. One of the principal things that is sought to be attained is to lessen unemployment. One of the things we want to do by this legislation—and I doubt whether it would be here if it were not for that—is to relieve the present terrible distressed conditions by giving jobs to men who want to work. I have not heard of any calculation having been made, and, of course, I have not heard of this amendment until just now, so I cannot estimate what effect its adoption would have upon the unemployment situation, but it is quite obvious, it seems to me, and it requires no time to reach the conclusion, that if the amendment shall be agreed to it will not bring about the relief in unemployment that the bill would do if unamended.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator knows, because he was chairman of the subcommittee which considered the bill, that for weeks and weeks hearings were held and testimony was adduced with reference to what effect the 5-day week and 6-hour day would have on the unemployment situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am familiar with that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The hearings were all printed; they are now before the Senate; and each Senator has the opportunity to read them in detail, if he so desires. As the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has said, the proposal embodied a certain philosophy proposed to be adopted in order to help remedy the situation. Now we are confronted, without a moment's notice, with a brand new philosophy and with a new set of circumstances and a new arrangement which the subcommittee never had any opportunity at all to study, and on which it took no evidence. Therefore we are entirely unprepared to pass on a measure of that kind, not having studied it.

Mr. NORRIS. As I remember, the evidence disclosed that, if this bill were passed restricting labor to 6 hours a day and 5 days in a week, it would help the unemployment situation by putting 6,000,000 men to work. I am wondering if I have stated the figures correctly. Does the Senator from Indiana remember them?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Some of the evidence was to the effect that it would put six and one-half million men to work.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Mr. President, that is something worth while, if we can do it. That will not be done if this amendment shall be agreed to, although it would help some, I concede. I cannot tell how much, but if we put 6,000,000 men to work that would be the greatest step that has yet been taken or contemplated or proposed in any one single proposition.

One can almost compute the number to a mathematical certainty, and it was so computed before the committee by many witnesses who appeared. As I remember, the evidence was that the enactment of this proposed law would, in round numbers, put 6,000,000 men to work. I know that it has been said in the course of this debate that it would reduce the wages that the men would receive per day. The Senator from Arkansas, I think, pretty well answered that; but it is the theory of those who believe in this proposed legislation, it is the theory of those who believe in its philosophy, that if 6,000,000 men were put to work, even though wages were temporarily reduced when that happened, it would mean 6,000,000 men would join the army of people who are able to spend money instead of receiving charity. It would put purchasing power in the hands of 6,000,000 who have now no purchasing power. It is the theory—and I believe it will work out in practice—that if 6,000,000 men who do not now have it, were given purchasing power, it would start the wheels of industry; it would open the factories; it would afford a market to the products of the farm; it would help all along the line, and when that happens, 6,000,000 more men would be given employment. There would be competition for jobs. Instead of men hungry and unfed walking the streets hunting for jobs, there would be more jobs than there would be men; there would be competition, and wages would go up instead of down. If it should not work in that way, then probably none of our plans will work.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if nothing is done we are headed for chaos, and it is not far in the distance. We cannot continue to feed 12,000,000 men and raise the necessary funds from taxing the balance of the country to do it. We must give the unemployed jobs; they must have work. That is the only way to give them purchasing power. I do not mean it is the only way in this bill, but I mean the purchasing power must be given to those who do not now possess it or we cannot hope for a return to prosperous times. It will be conceded that it is an impossibility for the depression to pass away and prosperity take its place unless, in some way or other, we place the purchasing power in the hands not only of the 12,000,000 unemployed but of the many other millions who have lost their purchasing power. It is not enough to put 6,000,000 men to work. We believe, however, that if 6,000,000 men can be put to work the wheels will be started, and whenever they start more men will get work. Then 6,000,000 men, instead of getting charity and doles, will have their self-respect returned to them; they will be buying shoes and clothes and better food, and will be building houses. That will give employment to 6,000,000 more, and that will start many factories that are now idle; that will bring smoke from many a chimney that is now cold. When that happens many millions more will have their purchasing power restored, and that will mean that the farmer who is now producing at a loss and who has completely lost his purchasing power will have his purchasing power restored to him.

So, Mr. President, regardless of what we think, regardless of what we believe ought to be the right number of working hours, we know that with men working 6 hours a day, in order to produce the same amount of products it will require more men than if they worked 8 or 10 or 12 or even 11 hours a day. So the more men who can be put to work, the bigger will be the push that will be given to the wheel that we must turn in order to get prosperity back.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from Nebraska—and I hope also the Senator from Arkansas will give me his attention—to the fact that this is what will happen if we amend this bill so as to provide for an 8-hour day: A corporation may simply shift its crews; in other words, I can run my sawmill until Friday morning at 12 o'clock with my regular crew, and then I can simply swap crews between corporations and run the other day and a half on the basis of a straight 8-hour day, and there will be nothing in the proposed law to forbid it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think that could be done.

Mr. LONG. Yes; it could be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no.

Mr. LONG. I should like to know why it could not be done.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear all the Senator's statement.

Mr. LONG. The point is this: It is proposed to forbid products to be transported in interstate commerce if they are made by labor employed more than 36 hours a week. Under the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, if it shall be adopted, that means that the employer must not work any one of his laborers more than 36 hours a week. Under this amendment that employer can work his men 8 hours a day until Friday at 12 o'clock. I have a sawmill called the "A Lumber Co." and another sawmill called the "B Lumber Co.", both incorporated, and I do not have to do a thing in the world on Friday at 12 o'clock but shift the crews and work the balance of the week and work on Sunday, too. So, under this amendment, I could have the same mills running 7 days a week with practically the same hands.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senate again to the fact that this is an emergency. I think I would favor this bill anyway; but we are now confronted with an emergency.

The bill provides that it shall be in effect for 2 years. There are "whereases" coupled with it in order to call attention to the emergency, all for the purpose of guarding against the possibility of an adverse decision by the Supreme Court on constitutional grounds.

Personally, I believe that the Supreme Court would sustain the measure, and that it could be sustained on perfectly legal grounds even without those provisions; but they will all help.

If we are going to have an emergency measure here for the purpose of reemploying the idle we ought not to put on the bill an amendment that will bring about an opposite effect, or tend to do that. This amendment will tend in that direction because the emergency quality of the bill will partially disappear when we provide for the employment of a less number of men.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not think I spoke in such a way that anyone could fail to understand what I said. We know that this law is going to be evaded and avoided in any way that it can be. What I said relative to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas I think by this time he no doubt clearly sees. He sat here thinking it over for several minutes.

The point is this: If we provide—we who have been in the manufacturing business as laborers, for instance—that we are going to let them work a man 36 hours a week 8 hours a day, the planing mill can be under one corporation and the sawmill can be under another corporation. You can cut just about as much lumber in 4½ days as it will take you to plane in 2½ days; and you will not have to do anything in the world but shut down the sawmill on Friday and open up the planing mill that afternoon and run the balance of the week.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The same thing could be done under the original bill.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; it could not!

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes!

Mr. LONG. Now that the Senator sees the first point, I will show him why it could not be done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no distinction between the provisions of the bill and the provisions of the amendment as to the switching of crews. When a man has worked the limit of his time, either as to hours per day or hours per week, he cannot be worked any more. That applies to the 30-hour limitation just exactly as it does to the 36-hour limitation.

Mr. LONG. The difference is this: The 30-hour provision of the original bill is founded upon the fact that a man cannot be worked more than 6 hours a day, nor more than 5 days a week. That leaves Saturday only. In other words, if they wished to hire an additional crew, or to shift crews, that crew would have only 1 day to work and only 6 hours of the day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; but under the Senator's statement a few moments ago, in which he said that they could work on Sunday——

Mr. LONG. They could.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (continuing). They could do the very same thing, if they wished to undertake it, under the terms of the bill that they could do under the amendment. There is no difference between the amendment and the bill in that particular.

Mr. LONG. Except in the particular that in one instance they would have 20 hours available to them, whereas in the other instance they would not have more than half that amount.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKLEY. This bill prevents the shipment in interstate commerce of any commodity manufactured in a factory where any person is worked more than 6 hours a day or more than 5 days a week; but under the original language of the bill the same process of shifting could go on that the Senator says could go on under the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LONG. There is not time enough to do the shifting.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; there is. The only difference would be that the men would work half a day longer under his shift than they would under this.

Mr. LONG. No; they would work 2 hours longer in the day. It is not a practical proposition. I think the Senator will agree with me that it is not nearly so feasible nor nearly so practical for them to provide for a shift of 6 hours as it would be to provide for a shift of 12 hours; and in this instance, assuming that 6 days is the normal running time, they would have a chance there to run for at least 12 hours more.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only difference would be probably an advantage in shifting under the bill as it is written, because it would be easier to shift on Saturday morning than it would be to shift at noon on Friday, for they would have all night to do the shifting instead of 1 hour.

Mr. LONG. But in the instance I point out, let us assume that they do evade the law. Under the law as now written by the Senator, they would never get over 36 hours' work out of a man; but if they evade the law as the Senator from Arkansas has provided, they will get 48 hours' work out of him, and we will have the same 8-hour law that we have right now. We will not have any difference in the law.

Now, this is the situation about the law, assuming that it is to be held constitutional, and I think it should be: If we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas we are going to have the 8-hour day. My opinion is that that will be about all that we will ever have. We will have an 8-hour day, and no more than an 8-hour day. I should like to see the Senator from Arkansas whittle his amendment down from 36 hours to 35 hours, 34 hours, or 33 hours, because I am afraid it is going to be adopted; but I certainly think it is going to modify the intent and purpose of the act.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, as stated by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] departs from the philosophy of the measure which was originally introduced in this body. I do not desire that this amendment be voted upon until I have stated my views in connection with it.

I might state that when I introduced this bill, I expected it to become a law. I did not anticipate at that time that it might become a law so quickly as I now believe that it will. I realized at the time I introduced the bill that the majority of the Senate or the majority of the House might make it necessary to increase the number of hours provided in the bill.

I do not yield for myself one particle of the belief that this bill should be restricted to 30 hours per week and 6 hours per day. I cannot agree, however, that a reduction to 36 hours would not be a wonderful thing for the people of this country.

I listened with interest to the statement of my good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. It would, of course, be possible for other puns to be drawn upon other names. If it be true that this act is to bear my name and to become the law, I desire to state to my good friend from Oklahoma that I desire no higher honor in this legislative body. Thank God, I am not living in my own mind in the Elizabethan era of a philosophy for a past age that does not suit modern conditions.

Who can deny that the system operated in this country under the rules and regulations which have been adopted has failed to function for the benefit of the men and women of the Nation?

I do not claim any monopoly of wisdom or vision. I do not think that either I or any Member of this body can claim that. I do claim, however, that no monopoly of wisdom can be claimed for him whose eyes are constantly turned toward the past, who has a backward vision into past ages, who seeks to do no more than to have the economic functions of this country guided, directed, shaped, and molded by formulas that may have fitted 200 years ago but do not fit the machine age, where men and women have been driven into economic slavery when they were promised economic liberty.

So, Mr. President, whether this bill as finally enacted into law liberates the weary bodies and the aching backs of tired human beings by reducing their working hours to 36, or whether it liberates them by reducing their working hours to 30, there has never been anything in my life heretofore, and I do not believe there will ever be anything hereafter, that I shall look upon with more pride than I do the small part I may have contributed to bring about this surcease from drudgery and labor which has made people more of slaves than the people who lived in the South in the olden days.

Mr. President, when I think of people in this Nation today, as the evidence shows, working 16 hours per day, with whirling machinery dinning into their ears, going home tired, worn out, and weary, going into their homes in such a condition that they can do nothing but retire and try to get a little sleep in order to forget the din and whirl in their ears, I do not apologize to the people of America for introducing a bill to use the arm of government to prevent that abuse, to prevent grinding down into human slavery men and women who are too weak and too helpless to protect themselves.

No, Mr. President; I admit the honesty, the integrity, and perhaps the superior wisdom of those who take an opposite philosophical view of government. I know that there are many who believe that the best thing to do is to let it alone; but I do not.

With reference to this bill, it is a question for the Senate to decide whether the original philosophy shall be retained or the amendment shall be adopted. Either one marks a milestone along the way of human progress and human hope. Either one, Mr. President, offers to those who toil in mill and in factory, to those whose bodies have been drained until as you look at their faces you can see that the blood has been taken away, a shorter working period in order that they, too, may enjoy some of that leisure which should be granted to all when machines can take the place of human beings.

It is easy, of course, for those who do not engage in those undertakings, for those who are not compelled to perform this drudgery, to forget how hard it is; but, Mr. President, leaving it to the Senate to vote upon this amendment as in its wisdom it sees fit, insofar as I am concerned, I was for the bill as it was originally introduced. I am for it yet. I cannot yield my own judgment as to what is best with reference to a vote upon the measure; but, of course, if it were necessary or if it is necessary to take the longer hours, I should prefer 36 hours to a continuance of the practices that are now in existence throughout this Nation. Why keep 12,000,000 people in idleness and then be fearful of the leisure that might be given to some others by shortening their hours of labor?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, whenever it becomes necessary seriously to discuss a measure of this kind, it is a good deal like discussing the reputation of a woman: it is too late.

I believe in the policy of sharing work. I believe in the policy of staggering work. I think that industry, as far as it can go without too much impairment of efficiency, ought to stagger employment, to distribute wages among as large a class of employees as may be found practicable in this distressed situation. If I fancied for one moment, if I indulged the golden dream—and I say "dream" deliberately—that this measure would give employment to 6,000,000 men, much as I object to it in principle, I would withhold my opposition. For the moment, and for the moment only, I waive the constitutional point—the belief that this measure runs counter to the Constitution and to the adjudicated cases.

If we employ 6,000,000 additional men, it will either increase the present output of our factories, or it will add to the cost of that output. If it enlarges the output, who will absorb this increasing surplus? If it adds to the cost of the output, who, in this stricken land, is able to pay advancing prices with diminishing wages, with diminishing incomes? That, sir, is a fantastic dream which will turn out to be a nightmare when this measure comes to be enforced.

Colbert, the great financier of France, asked the manufacturers of that country what the Government could do to improve the conditions of manufacture. The answer is historic, the answer is celebrated, "Laissez nous faire"—"Let us alone."

Only the other day a practical farmer from South Dakota appeared before the Committee on Agriculture. Some Senator asked him what he desired to have the Government do for him. He returned the same celebrated answer, speaking as a farmer in behalf of the farmers, "Let us alone."

That, sir, was the soul of the political philosophy of Thomas Jefferson. He said, "That government is best which governs least." The minimum of government in one age is not indeed the minimum of government in another. Circumstances modify the degree of government which is essential to law and order, to the protection of human life and human liberty.

Mr. President, that does not mean that we must undertake to regulate and to interfere with all human activities. I cannot imagine this measure giving employment to 6,000,000, 4,000,000, 2,000,000, or even 1,000,000 unemployed.

What will happen? What I think will happen is that hours will decrease, wages will decrease, work will speed up, and labor will be driven to perform as much work in 6 hours as in 8. The wage earners, threatened, frightened by the breadline, will attempt the task.

I accept the challenge. I renounce the philosophy of this measure. It is the philosophy of the defeatist. It is the doctrine of the defeatist. It accepts defeatism as a philosophy. Nay, more, it accepts defeatism as a fact. I do not.

There are millions and hundreds of millions of human beings on this globe half fed, hungry, starving—hundreds of millions half clad, naked, freezing—hundreds of millions with no rooftree above their heads. This bill proceeds upon the theory that we have more things than people need, that we have more things than people want. When the needs of the human race are supplied, when the legitimate wants of the human race are satisfied, and there is still a surplus bankrupting the producer, then, sir, will I consider this doctrine, this measure of the defeatist, stopping progress, staying production, surrendering, beating a retreat; may I not use the phrase "crawling in a hole and pulling the hole in after us."

Let us exhaust every human effort to devise a better system of distribution, a better system of supplying human needs and human wants, before we convert plenty into scarcity and create a famine by law.

Mr. President, I know that new truths render ancient good uncouth, and that we should change our methods with changing circumstances. But I think we ought to distinguish between those things which are changeable and those things which are not changeable. Failure to make that distinction involves some statesmen in utter and outer confusion.

It may be, sir, that we ought to change the sea level with the ebbing and flowing of the tide. I still adhere to and I still believe in the law of gravity, and I think it defies change. It does not vary with the varying hour. I apologize to the Senator from Alabama, I am old-fashioned, and, sir, I still have, I will say, a qualified, a lingering faith in the multiplication table. There are philosophers who assert that there are quarters in the universe where 2 and 2 do not make 4; I do not know. I do not accept that philosophy. There are some Senators who seem to embrace that new-fangled philosophy, some who think that 2 and 2 make 3 from midnight until noon, that from noon to midnight 2 and 2 make 5, varying during the interval with the sign of the zodiac, the quarter of the moon, the state of the tides, and the direction of the trade winds.

I remember that Mr. Jefferson said on one occasion, speaking of a truth which did not vary with the winds, that it constituted the compass to guide our voyage across the ocean of time—not across the babbling brook of the passing hour. I do not complain of those who change their views with the varying winds. That is their privilege. I merely wish to be excused myself.

It seems to me at times, Mr. President, that we proceed upon the theory that all standards have lost their value, that the sea level is standing upon end, that all moorings have slipped, and all anchors have broken, that all constants are variable, and that all variables are capricious and erratic, playing hide and seek with truth, that one computation is as safe and sound as another, if only made under the potent magic of a wishbone.

I think we will be admonished, when we pass this measure, that there are some principles which still abide, that there are some truths which are still eternal. How often do these promising measures cheat the hopes of their sponsors. I heard only the other day that in one of the Western States there is a minimum wage law for women, passed with the loftiest sentiments of humanity, sentiments which would adorn the Senator from Alabama, but, sir, in these distressed times, the employers cannot afford to pay those minimum wages to the women, even though the women would rejoice to accept them. But under a penal statute undertaking to elude economic forces which defy circumvention, those impoverished women are being driven from their jobs. Men who are eligible to accept the places at reduced wages are stepping into the places occupied by these women, and the lofty sentiment has suffered an abortion in that State, has sacrificed the interests, perhaps the health, possibly the lives, of those women whose positions have passed to men, in the interest of lofty sentimentalism which seeks to elude economic forces which defy control, which defy your puny power, which defy your imperious "be it enacted."

A few years ago I was out in Illinois, at the little town of Effingham, stopping at a small hotel which was run by a lady. She had a mocking bird, a beautiful singer. I was admiring its song and praising the songbird. The lady told me that her keeping of that bird at that time was a crime, that she was violating the law of the land, that she was a criminal under the laws of the great State of Illinois for harboring the sweet singer. Humanitarians in that State had succeeded in securing the passage of a law requiring that all native birds in captivity should be released, and she said her neighbors had obeyed the law and had released the birds they possessed, some of which had been in confinement for years. These birds were gentle; they were unafraid, they had no sense of danger, they could not provide for themselves, they were unprepared for the struggle of existence; and when they were liberated, when their liberty was restored to them, to put it bluntly, they were devoured by the cats. Oversanguine Senators should be warned by that catastrophe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The time of the Senator from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Senate. After having spoken for about 10 minutes,

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A number of Senators cannot remain for a longer session this afternoon. It is apparent that we can complete consideration of the bill in a very short time tomorrow. It is my intention to move now a short executive session, with the understanding that the Senator from Kentucky may resume his speech tomorrow.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want it understood, if we are to recess now, that I am to retain the floor when we meet tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the understanding.

[Mr. BARKLEY's speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded.]

REDUCTION OF GOLD CONTENT IN DOLLAR

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article by Mark Sullivan on the subject of reducing the gold content in the dollar.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHOULD UNITED STATES GO OFF GOLD STANDARD AMERICAN COURTS MIGHT RULE THAT GOLD CLAUSE IS NOT BINDING

By Mark Sullivan

WASHINGTON.—The writer of this article has happened, through the depression, to be in a position where he saw events developing from the inside. It has been an experience productive of many forms of interest, provocative of many reflections. Among these one of the most frequent has been to observe how some comparatively unnoticed incident, often remote, can have consequences flowing out, farther out, in larger and larger circles until every inhabitant of every village in America, every farmer on every farm, felt the effects come home to him.

One of the present conditions, so far almost completely unnoticed, but destined shortly to be much talked about, is a thing called the "gold clause." It is with the gold clause that the present article deals. And what is said here will have, I am sure, fascinating interest—if not now, surely in a little while—for every lawyer and banker. And if I can succeed in making it clear enough it may have interest for the average reader who, sooner or later, is going to be affected in his fortunes by what is done or not done about the gold clause. I think it likely that substantially every reader of this article either owes or has due to him a debt which is affected by the gold clause.

The question which occupied practically every important mind in the country during the past week—and which vitally affected every mind, whether important or not, and every person from the lowest to the highest, the poorest to the richest—was, Is the United States off, or going off, the present gold standard?

Throughout this depression it has been almost universally assumed that for a particular reason America would not—let us say almost could not—go off the gold standard; that there was in America a condition which made departure from the gold standard so inexpedient as to be practically impossible. Great Britain might go off the gold standard, as it did on September 20, 1931—but in America there was a condition which made imitation by us of Britain's example so difficult as to be impossible. France might reduce the gold content of its currency, but America, for a particular reason, could not or must not.

The reason, the insuperable condition, was the presence in billions of American mortgages and bonds of the gold clause. And to understand something vital that is just ahead of us, it is desirable to recite briefly the history of the gold clause in American bonds and mortgages.

BRYAN POLICY REVEALED

There was in the United States intermittently, indeed, almost steadily, from after the Civil War until 1896, the same question, the same commotion, that is now bedeviling us. It was a demand for "inflation", a demand that paper dollars (to an indefinite number) be made arbitrarily equal to a gold dollar, or that silver dollars of a certain weight be made arbitrarily equal to a gold dollar. The demand came to a head in the Presidential campaign of 1896 when William Jennings Bryan made the Democratic fight upon an issue which said, in effect, that 16 ounces of silver should be made by law exactly equal to 1 ounce of gold; or to put it in terms of money, that a gold dollar should be made equal in value to a silver dollar of 16 times the gold dollar's weight.

This 30 years of agitation for inflation created, as agitation about inflation always does, a fear that the paper dollar might become less in value than the gold dollar; that, indeed, the paper dollar, if inflation should go far enough, might become worth only a few cents in gold, or practically nothing. (As the German mark did in 1924.) To forestall that possibility, lawyers drawing up mortgages during the eighteen seventies, eighties, and nineties, fell into the way of writing into mortgages a gold clause. The common form was that the mortgagor, the debtor, promises to pay $1,000 (or whatever else might be the sum) in gold dollars of the present standard of weight and fineness.

The insertion of this gold clause in all sorts of mortgages, bonds, and other instrumentalities of debt, was practically universal up to 1896. Many of these old mortgages and bond contracts, written preceding 1896, still exist, especially in the case of railroads.

But the writing of the gold clause into mortgages and bonds did not cease in 1896. Lawyers, in many of their mental operations, are an apelike folk. A lawyer subsequent to 1896—indeed, as late as 1930—called upon to write a mortgage or a bond, looked up the language of an existing mortgage or bond, and faithfully copied it word for word. Through this tradition and precedent the writing of the gold clause into mortgages and all contracts of debts became a habit, a routine.

Thirty years or more after the fight on the gold standard, after Bryan was dead, after the old fights for inflation through "greenbackism" and "free silver" had been forgotten, after the United States was supposed to be as securely on the gold basis as English is the common tongue—after all that time, young lawyers who had not even been born when Bryan demanded free silver, lawyers in little county seats in Kansas and Iowa, and even more the big lawyers of New York and Chicago, continued to write into mortgages and other contracts of debt the old formula that "this contract shall be payable in gold dollars of the present standard of weight and fineness."

CREDITORS CAN DEMAND GOLD

The result is that there are literally billions of dollars, probably hundreds of billions, of such mortgages and bonds in existence. The exception, indeed, is to find a bond or mortgage or other contract of debt which does not contain the gold clause. Any reader of this article can entertain himself for a few minutes by reading carefully the language of any bond he happens to own, or any mortgage he happens to owe. Probably not one person in a thousand has ever read the complex legal verbiage of the instrument he relies upon or which he is expected to pay. If he will read it now he will find, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, that the bond or mortgage says "gold dollars of the present standard of weight and fineness."

Now a gold dollar "of the present standard of weight" contains 23.22 grains of gold. That has been the standard since before the Civil War. And the gold clause in those billions of dollars of bonds and mortgages is supposed to guarantee, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the creditor, the owner of a $1,000 bond, for example, can, if he chooses, demand and insist on receiving $1,000 each containing 23.22 grains.

It is the presence of this gold clause in billions of American contracts that has been supposed to make it impossible for the United States to go off the gold standard. The gold clause does not exist, or at least is not habitual, in the mortgages and debt contracts in other countries. Consequently it was simple for the British to go off the gold basis and for the French to say their franc should contain less gold than it formerly had.

But, as it has been almost universally argued, the United States could not go off the gold standard, nor say that the gold dollar in future shall contain, for example, only 15 grains, because the existence of these billions of dollars of old debt contracts would create too much difficulty, become too intolerable a hardship on persons and corporations obliged to pay their debts in the old and heavier gold dollar.

Throughout all the discussion ran, of course, the question which may be stated thus: If the United States should go off the gold basis, or if the United States should decree that the gold dollar shall contain a smaller amount of gold—in that event what would the courts do about the contracts to pay in old standard? To ask what the courts would do about these old contracts is, in effect, to ask what the Supreme Court of the United States would do, for everybody knows that the Supreme Court would have the final say.

UP TO THE COURTS

In the inner discussions that arose in several crises in this depression, on the two or three occasions when the Government was obliged to give consideration at least to the possibility of going off the gold standard, or being forced off it—always thought was given to this question: What would the courts do about these old contracts of debt containing the old clause for payment in existing gold dollars?

The time preceding the present when we came nearest to going off the gold standard was in early February 1932. At that time, though the country never knew it, and though we pulled out of that crisis, we were within a few weeks of being obliged to go off the gold standard. On that occasion, when it was necessary to consider whether we might later go off the gold standard, Mr. Hoover, with his habitual care to provide for future possibilities, asked one of his legal assistants to give him an opinion—which, of course, could only be a surmise—as to what the courts might do about the old gold-clause contracts in the event that America should go off the gold standard. The opinion, of course, could be only a guess. The courts had never had occasion to decide the question, and what the courts might do, if and when the question should arise, was a question as to which the best of lawyers could only make a guess.

We are apparently a little nearer today to the same question. What the courts would do about these billions in existing mortgages, bonds, and other debt contracts is at this moment a pretty practical question. The answer, of course, now as before, can be only a surmise; but there has been a recent event which throws greater light on what the courts might do than any we have had before.

The gold clause is, I have said, almost solely an American institution. In other countries it exists hardly at all, but it turns out that there was at least one such contract in Great Britain, and that the British courts were obliged to answer precisely the question which our own courts will be obliged to answer if we should go off the gold basis or if we should reduce the quantity of gold in the standard dollar. The chancery division of the British high court answered the question a few weeks ago, and their answer throws light on what our own courts might do—light which, incidentally, will be acutely discomforting to creditors who have been thinking that they have an absolute and impregnable right to demand "gold dollars of the present standard of weight and fineness."

In Great Britain in 1928 a certain corporation borrowed money and into the contract for repayment wrote a clause saying that the sum was "payable in gold coin of the United Kingdom or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing September 1, 1928."

CLAUSE KNOCKED OUT

Three years later Great Britain went off the gold standard, and the British pound, formerly worth $4.86 in gold, became worth some $3.20. Still later, a few weeks ago, the debt mentioned became due, and the creditor demanded payment, according to the language of his contract, in the old gold pounds. The debtor tendered ordinary paper pounds. The creditor haughtily refused them, insisted on having his gold, and went into court to get it.

What the British courts did to that gold clause is what Jack Dempsey did to Jess Willard. They knocked it out, firmly, fatally, and finally. That was "not a bullion contract," said the court; "that is, it was not a contract having to do with mining and calling for gold bullion as some contract might call for land or coffee or cotton. Not at all," said the court. "The contract is a simple contract to secure payment of a sum of money, and if the defendants (the debtor) tendered the sum of money in question in whatever might happen to be legal tender at the date the payment was due they have discharged their obligation. * * * To attempt to impose upon the debtor an obligation to pay in a particular form and not anything which is legal tender is an attempt to do something which cannot be enforced if the contract is a mere contract for payment of money."

That decision has a most important bearing on what is apparently about to arise in the United States, if we go off the existing gold standard. Decisions of British courts are, of course, not binding on American courts. But no one can read that British decision in full without coming pretty firmly to the conviction that the American courts would take the same position.

The hardly inescapable inference is that any American owing a mortgage or a bond or a debt on a contract containing the gold clause will be able to pay his debt in whatever is legal tender at the time the debt comes due, paper dollars, silver dollars, or any other form, provided it is legal tender. As respects creditors the deduction is that anyone who fondly believes he can demand 23.22 grains of literal gold for each dollar due him may be as disillusioned as Shylock was on a similar occasion.

In short, the gold clause seems likely to go the same path as a good many other institutions hitherto considered impregnable. These are tough times for Gibraltars.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p.m.) took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, April 6, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 5 (legislative day of Mar. 13, 1933)

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

Sumner Welles to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY

Claude G. Bowers to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Spain.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord and the Master of us all, ours is the heart sob of humanity. Death, of which all men stand in jeopardy every hour, has darkened and broken the circle of our brothers and our defenders. Heavenly Father, look upon us with the sweet, compelling love of Thy pity. We are so helpless. Quivering with alarm, wrapped in the curtains of a tragic night, they held on to their honor unto the last. Under the sea, under the sea, in the mysterious depths of a black world, O God, their cold lips make no answer to the cries of their loved ones. Oh, theirs is the bread of tears. O come to the widows and the orphans and be the star of hope and of promise in their sunless skies; penetrate the veil that hangs over their unborn tomorrows. Manifest Thyself toward us through the hours of this day, and may we have no memory of gifts withheld or service unrendered that shall mar the bliss of an untroubled conscience. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.J.Res. 13. Joint resolution authorizing the Attorney General, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Navy, to release claims of the United States upon certain assets of the Pan American Petroleum Co. and the Richfield Oil Co. of California and others in connection with collections upon a certain judgment in favor of the United States against the Pan American Petroleum Co. heretofore duly entered.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. RAYBURN] I ask unanimous consent that that committee may sit during the session of the House.

Mr. SNELL. During the entire session?

Mr. BYRNS. The request applied particularly to the consideration of the securities bill, and I will limit my request to that, Mr. Speaker, so that the chairman can make further request himself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may be permitted to sit during the session of the House during the consideration of the securities bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE "AKRON"

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes on the subject of the Akron.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I feel impelled by a sense of duty to make a short statement this morning concerning the terrible accident that took the lives of a number of brave officers and men yesterday in connection with the destruction of the dirigible Akron.

For a number of years I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and it so happened I was chairman of a subcommittee that went to Lakehurst on the 22d day of February last year for the purpose of making a trial flight on that ship, after having participated in an investigation that related to charges that faulty material was used in the construction, that the ship was overweight, and that it could not perform the efficient service for which it was constructed.

Citizens of this Nation everywhere are wondering what the Congress is going to do. Millions of dollars have been expended in the construction of this type of ship, also hangars. There is grave doubt in the minds of a large number of the citizens of this country if dirigibles of this type can perform an efficient service as a branch of an arm of national defense. Having that thought in mind, I feel that a committee of the House of Representatives ought to be appointed rather than some committee that does not have the right to bring witnesses before it or to exercise ordinary jurisdiction of a committee set up for this purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Few, if any, of us in the House are experts on such questions. Does the gentleman not believe that this whole subject could better be investigated by the trained scientific, experienced experts in our Navy and War Departments?

Mr. McCLINTIC. For this reason I feel that whenever a committee is composed of members that have military projects within their districts, they are more or less under the influence of the department of the Government that has jurisdiction over such projects. I do not wish to cast an aspersion against any Member of Congress, but I feel that this House should appoint a committee that is not directly interested in any project that comes under the jurisdiction of the Army or the Navy, having in mind that this is an important question. This is a question that deals with an arm of national defense and the expenditure of millions of dollars in money. We all know that dirigibles seven or eight hundred feet long, when in the air, are subject to sudden gusts of wind, and that the superstructure is built in such way that it is more or less frail. I remember very distinctly when this ship, the Akron, fell that it struck a solid embankment in the way of a railroad track. It broke some of the superstructure. I took the position then that the entire superstructure had undergone a severe strain and I believed that some disaster might come to this ship, and I gave out a statement on February 22 that I did not care to ever be a passenger on such ship. Now, that which we have been told leads us to believe that the ship broke in two, because if it had not, then it would have rested easily down on the water. Some have said it opened up like a clamshell. If that is true, then a portion of the superstructure gave way, and it might be if the Naval Affairs Committee had had the power to have brought witnesses from Akron, Ohio, a different result might be before us today.

So, that being true, I think this House should appoint a committee of seven Members and let the committee have authority to administer oaths; let them have the power to compel witnesses to come before them, because this is a national question, one of vital importance, and we ought to know whether or not we want to continue this arm of the service.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution which I am sending to the Clerk's desk may be read for information.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be read by the Clerk, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas a grave disaster has occurred which has resulted in the loss of the lives of a number of naval officers and enlisted men, and in addition the U.S. dirigible Akron; and

Whereas such ship was alleged to have been constructed in part out of faulty material and an investigation made by the House Committee on Naval Affairs, at which no witness testified except those connected with the Navy, and the subcommittee in reporting made the following statement:

"The Subcommittee on Aeronautics of the Committee on Naval Affairs has carefully considered all of the evidence submitted in the hearings held for the purpose of investigating charges of sabotage, poor construction, faulty material, and overweight in the building of the dirigible Akron.

"No direct testimony was presented by any person who had first-hand information relative to the charges of sabotage, faulty material, poor construction, and overweight, other than by representatives of the United States Navy."

Whereas there is a question as to whether or not such ships can perform satisfactory service, having in mind that the Roma, built by Italy, was destroyed, causing the death of 34 men; the LZ–14 exploded, killing the entire crew of 28; the R–38, built for England, buckled and exploded, killing 45 out of 50; and the U.S. Shenandoah broke in two, killing some of the crew and a number of passengers: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the Membership of the House a select committee of seven members, who are not directly interested in the Army or Navy, and who shall make a complete investigation of the disaster that destroyed the Akron and the advisability of constructing additional ships of this type.

For the purpose of said inquiry the committee, or any subcommittee designated by it, shall have the power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, affirmations, to take testimony, to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess of the House, and may hold its sessions at such places as the committee may determine.

Such committee shall have the right at any time to report to the House in one or more reports the result of its inquiry, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

That the committee shall have the right to employ such experts as may be needed in making this investigation.

That any expense incurred in this connection is hereby authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The Speaker is hereby empowered to issue subpenas to witnesses upon the request of the chairman of said committee at any time, including any recess of the House, during the inquiry of the committee, and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpenas and other processes transferred to him by the said committee.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve the right to object to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understood, the gentleman offered the resolution for information.

Mr. McCLINTIC. That is all.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma is not applicable in some respects to the circumstances of this tragedy and would not be pertinent. Reference is made in the resolution, for instance, to the Roma and other dirigibles which were destroyed due to explosion.

The gentleman, of course, is well aware of the fact that neither in the case of the Shenandoah nor the Akron was the accident due to explosion. In this country, since the inauguration of the helium project, no dirigible accident has been due to explosion.

It seems to me the investigation should be limited to structural defects, to the matter of the methods, plans, and specifications by which these dirigibles should be built, and that the matter of the loss heretofore of such aircraft by explosion is really not applicable to or pertinent to the investigation that should be conducted.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am in entire accord with the gentleman, but this reference has nothing to do with the intent of the resolution. The resolution is broad enough to make possible the investigation of the entire subject of dirigibles and to find out whether or not it is advisable to continue expending money in their building.

Mr. LANHAM. But it seems to me, I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, that the verbiage of the resolution is somewhat misleading, because in the cases of the Shenandoah and the Akron certainly the accidents cannot be attributed to the causes which produced the accidents in the Roma and the English dirigible.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I hope the gentleman will bear with me. I am glad to have his interruption. The reason I put these facts in the preamble to the resolution is because this information has been carried to the press, and the people interested in this subject know of the accidents that occurred to dirigibles in the past. If the committee is appointed, of course it will take into consideration all of the facts relating to dirigibles in this country. As far as I am concerned, it is not necessary to go into the subject of explosions, but these statements were included in the resolution to give a résumé of the record relating to the construction of dirigibles.

Mr. LANHAM. I agree with the gentleman, and the former accidents to dirigibles were due to explosion of the gas with which they were filled.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The gentleman is entirely correct, and his suggestion would not in any way interfere with the powers of the committee to be appointed under this resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Gladly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman is having the resolution read for information at this time. Is it the gentleman's intention to introduce the resolution later in the day?

Mr. McCLINTIC. It is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that before the resolution is introduced he should incorporate in it a provision for the payment of the expenses of this investigation. Otherwise, the gentleman will have to go to another committee for that purpose.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Had the gentleman listened to the reading of the resolution, he would have noticed there is a provision authorizing that the expenses of the investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It should be in the form of a limitation.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It is not stated in the form of a limitation; it simply states that the expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma spoke to me about the resolution. Here is the trouble with the question of expense. As has been suggested, a limitation on the amount of money to be expended should be put into the resolution. Under the authority of the resolution as read this committee may sit when and where it pleases. It provides for the calling of all sorts of experts and it provides for the summoning of witnesses and bringing witnesses here.

Of course I know any committee that is appointed is not going to be unduly extravagant, but it does seem the House should have some information, and the committee should have some information, as to just what is going to be expended so there will not be any great sum spent on it, for the reason it appears that the Committee on Naval Affairs is proceeding to investigate it, and the Navy Department is proceeding to investigate it, as we know they will. Therefore, as I say, there should be some limitation in the resolution, and I hope before the gentleman introduces it he will incorporate such a limitation.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I think the suggestions of the majority leader are timely.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Answering the distinguished majority leader, I am in accord with his views; but because we had neither money nor the power to bring witnesses before us in the previous investigation we were able to hear only one side of the question. We might possibly have reached an entirely different result had we had $500 or $1,000 to have brought the witnesses before the committee.

In view of the enormous interest the people are taking in this subject everywhere, I think the House should at least have a committee to look into this subject.

I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that we ought not to expend more than a small sum of money, and I do not think it will require more than a small sum. Before introducing the resolution I shall be glad to consult with the gentleman from Tennessee and incorporate in the resolution a limitation of the amount that may be expended.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I am in entire sympathy with the observations made by the gentleman from Oklahoma and I hope he is provided with sufficient funds, $1,000 or $2,000, to enable him to call witnesses; but I do hope the gentleman will call the two agents of the Department of Justice who made the investigation over a period of 6 weeks' time in connection with the charges of sabotage against the Akron several years ago. These very efficient agents of the Department of Justice made a thorough investigation, submitted their report, and they are still members of the Department of Justice and available as witnesses to testify to the facts. I want to bring this report out into the open so that the public will have the facts. They are entitled to this report because these agents developed that Paul Kassay, a former Hungarian officer and an avowed Communist, was attempting as an employee of the company constructing the Akron to deliberately sabotage it.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am in accord with the gentleman, and I may say that the Committee on Naval Affairs at the time of its investigation into this matter appointed a subcommittee. The subcommittee went to the Department of Justice and looked over the records but made no report as to details.

Mr. FISH. That is just it.

Mr. McCLINTIC. They made no report as to details to the main committee. As far as I am concerned, personally, I have never been advised as to the contents of this report.

Mr. FISH. The American people are entitled to this report, and the Department of Justice, I am confident, would be glad to have it made public. There was no Federal law under which Kassay could be tried, so he was tried under the Ohio State syndicalist law, which the trial judge held unconstitutional, and consequently Comrade Kassay escaped without further trial. My purpose is to secure adequate Federal laws against such criminal actions and to prove definitely the charges of sabotage.

Mr. DELANEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield.

Mr. DELANEY. This morning the Naval Affairs Committee met and the chairman of the committee appointed a subcommittee to investigate this entire situation. The subcommittee is going to wait until the Navy Department has a report ready and we are then going to work independently of the Navy Department. As chairman of this subcommittee, I can assure the gentleman we will have a very thorough investigation.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am very pleased to have that information from my distinguished colleague, but I may say that the gentleman is in the same boat we were in before when the Naval Committee made the first investigation. The subcommittee will not have a dime of money to pay the expenses of witnesses; and, as a rule, the committee never puts anybody under oath.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is a difficulty that is not insurmountable, because the Naval Affairs Committee could come to the Committee on Rules and ask for special authority for money and power to subpena witnesses and keep the matter in the Naval Affairs Committee without the appointment of a separate committee.

Mr. McCLINTIC. That is true; but will the citizens of the Nation be satisfied to have a committee do this that did not obtain all of the facts when they made the first investigation?

Mr. BLANTON. And the committee certainly has the right now to swear witnesses without going to the Rules Committee.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. I have no controversy with the statements made by the gentleman from Oklahoma. This is very important to the American people. On the other hand, I do not think we should be rushed off our feet and go into this matter too hurriedly. I think it is probably only fair to wait a few days and see what the Navy Department itself is going to do, and also let us take into consideration what the Senate is going to do. Perhaps, after we know a little more about the general situation, we may form some kind of general committee that would include Members of both Houses of Congress, and we would then not be duplicating the work. There is no doubt in my mind that some kind of investigation eventually will be made; but let us not rush into it too hurriedly, and let us know just what we want to do before we start.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I thank the gentleman; and I may say that my only object in bringing this matter before the House is to enable the Members of the House to give a proper answer when they receive inquiries concerning this subject. I know that the Naval Affairs Committee, unless it is given some money, cannot conduct a proper examination. This is the reason that the section in the report that was just read was written, showing we did not have before us witnesses except on one side of the question. For this reason we wrote a report based on the kind of information that was given us, largely, by the Navy.

Mr. SNELL. There is no doubt that to make an investigation such as is necessary and one that will be of some value is going to cost considerable money and require considerable time on the part of someone. This is the reason I think we should proceed carefully before we initiate this investigation.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to add to what the gentleman has said that I decided not to introduce this resolution yesterday, but to wait until some of the facts with respect to this accident could be ascertained.

Mr. SNELL. This resolution would go to the Rules Committee, and, of course, the members of that committee would give ample time for its consideration.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I believe if the gentleman would stipulate in his resolution that not over $10,000 should be used, this would be sufficient to carry on the investigation. I would like to say further that I believe in the appointment of anyone on any committee the Speaker ought to confer with the individual to see that he is interested enough in the proposition to give his time to it, because if men are appointed on the committee that are not interested in the proposition, they will not bring back to the House a report in which we can have much confidence and they will not do the work that is contemplated.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The suggestions of the gentleman are helpful, but I had this thought in mind. If any military committee makes this investigation, there will be individuals throughout the Nation who will say that we did not go into the subject in a fair way. For this reason I wanted the Speaker authorized to appoint such a committee as he desires. Then we will know that we can answer any question that may come up in the future with respect to any favoritism, and no one could say that there was a whitewash.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to suggest to the gentleman that his resolution, so far as expenditures are concerned, is not in the proper form and is wide open. The gentleman provides for the employment of experts and makes it mandatory that the expenses be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. I think the gentleman should follow the usual form and put some limitation in the resolution.

Mr. McCLINTIC. The reason I brought the matter to the attention of the House this morning was because I wanted the information that is coming to me now so that when the resolution is ultimately introduced, it can be limited in the way of expenditures, so there will not be a long-drawn-out session involved.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. May I make this observation? I consider the investigation to be made by this committee as of more importance than the investigation made by the Navy Department. The American people will depend very largely upon the report of this committee, more so than on the report of the Navy, because this investigation should be made by a disinterested and unprejudiced body, and the American people know the attitude of the Navy toward the problem involved in its investigation.

For that reason a report by the Navy Department will not be so convincing to the American people because of its known attitude toward the question of dirigibles as a report made by a committee of Congress, which is supposed to be absolutely disinterested.

THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House for this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

TO PROVIDE REVENUE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BY THE TAXATION OF BEVERAGES

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments:

On page 3, line 7, of the Senate engrossed amendments strike out "six" and insert "two."

On page 3, line 8, of the Senate engrossed amendment, beginning immediately following the colon, strike out through the word "business", in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That it shall be within the discretion of the Commissioners whether any permit under this act shall be issued for the sale of any such beverage in any building in the District of Columbia owned or leased by the United States and used for the transaction of public business"; and the Senate agree to the same.

MARY T. NORTON,
VINCENT L. PALMISANO,
LORING M. BLACK, Jr.,
JAS. L. WHITLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
ROBERT D. CAREY,
J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3342) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia by the taxation of beverages, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

BEVERAGES INCLUDED

The House bill authorized beer, ale, porter, and similar brewed or fermented beverages containing one half of 1 percent or more of alcohol by volume and not more than 3.2 percent of alcohol by weight. The Senate amendment also included wines and fruit juices of like alcoholic content. The effect of the amendment was to authorize essentially the same kind of beverages as are authorized by the national beer bill. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

PERSONNEL FOR ENFORCEMENT OF ACT

The House bill authorized the Commissioners to employ clerical and other assistants to administer the act, the expenses, not to exceed $25,000, to be paid from the funds arising from license fees under this act. The Senate amendment omitted this provision. The conference agreement omits the House provision.

PERSONS TO WHOM PERMITS MAY BE ISSUED

The House bill provided for the issuance of permits to individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations. Under the Senate amendment no permit may be issued to an unincorporated association. The conference agreement retains the Senate limitation.

"ON-SALE" PERMITS

Both the House bill and the amendment provided for the issuance of "on sale" permits to bona fide restaurants and hotels. The House bill provided also for permits to bona fide incorporated clubs with annual dues of at least $15. The Senate amendment reduced the required annual dues to $6. The conference agreement retains the Senate reduction in required dues.

In the case of restaurants, the House bill permitted "on sale" permittees to serve beverages at "tables." The Senate amendment required the sale to be at "public tables", but provided that no beverage should be sold in any room not used primarily for the serving and consumption of food. However, the Senate amendment authorized the Commissioners to permit the sale of beverages in private rooms or at private tables in the case of assemblages of more than six individuals. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision. The Senate amendment provided that no permit shall be issued for any restaurant which has not been established and doing business for at least 6 months immediately prior to the application for the permit. The House bill had no such requirement. The conference agreement reduces the 6 months' period to 2 months.

In the case of clubs, the House permitted the sale only at tables. The Senate amendment extended the privilege to the rooms of members or guests. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

"OFF-SALE" PERMITS

The House bill authorized holders of "off-sale" permits to sell beverages only "in original packages". The Senate amendment permitted sales in the immediate container in which the beverage was received by the permittee, except that in the case of an "off-sale" permit held by a manufacturer or wholesaler the beverages may be sold only in such closed containers as the Commissioners may prescribe. The Senate amendment also prohibited sale by a holder of an "off-sale" permit to other permittees for resale. The Senate amendment also forbade an "off-sale" permit and an "on-sale" permit to be in force at the same time with respect to the same premises. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

MANUFACTURERS' PERMITS

The House bill required a manufacturer's permit under which it is lawful to sell only to a person holding a permit. The Senate amendment limited the sale to sales in barrels, bottles, and other closed containers, and sale to the other permittee must be for resale only. Under the Senate amendment a manufacturer may get one "off-sale" permit which is confined to his premises as a manufacturer, and sales under such "off-sale" permit must be in such containers as the Commissioners may prescribe. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

WHOLESALERS' PERMITS

The House bill apparently did not provide for a wholesaler's permit. The Senate amendment requires a wholesaler to obtain a permit at a fee of $250 a year and he is permitted to sell to other permittees for resale only, and may sell only in barrels, bottles, or other closed containers. He may hold only one "off-sale" permit, which shall be issued only for his premises as a wholesaler, and under such permit the beverages may be sold only in such closed containers as the Commissioners may prescribe. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SOLICITORS' PERMITS

The Senate amendment makes it unlawful for any individual to offer for sale or to solicit any order for the sale of, within the District of Columbia, any beverage unless he has obtained a solicitor's permit and unless the vendor is a holder of a permit issued under the act, but the prohibition does not apply to offers for sale or solicitations made upon the premises of the vendor. Solicitors' permits are issued for a fee of $1 per year and may be issued only on the recommendation of the vendor for whom the solicitor is acting. Nothing in the act is to be construed as repealing any portion of the District of Columbia License Act, as amended July 1, 1932. None of these provisions were in the House bill. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SALES IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS

The Senate amendment provides that no license shall be issued for the sale of beverages in any building owned or leased by the United States and used for transaction of public business. The House bill had no such limitation. The bill as agreed to in conference provides that it shall be within the discretion of the Commissioners whether any permit shall be issued for the sale of beverages in any such public buildings in the District of Columbia.

APPLICATION FOR AND ISSUANCE OF PERMITS

The Senate amendment rewrites these provisions of the House bill in the interest of a more orderly statement and easier administration. The House bill required the Commissioners before issuing any licenses to determine the total number of licenses to be issued, which number may be increased or diminished at any time. The Senate amendment omits this provision but inserts the requirement that not more than five "on-sale" permits shall be issued to any one person. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

The Senate amendment also amplifies the provisions of the House bill in regard to the interrelation of the "on-sale" or "off-sale" permittee and the manufacturer or wholesaler. Under the Senate amendment before an "off-sale" or "on-sale" permit is issued the Commissioners must satisfy themselves that no manufacturer or wholesaler has any substantial financial interest, direct or indirect, in the business for which the permit is requested or in the premises for which the permit is to be issued, and that the business will not be conducted with any moneys, equipment, furniture, fixtures, or property rented from or loaned or given by any manufacturer or wholesaler. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

The House bill contained no provision for renewal of permits. The Senate amendment provides for a renewal of a permit on approval of the Commissioners without making a new application. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

DESIGNATION OF MANAGERS

The Senate amendment provides for the designation by a permittee of a person to manage his business for him, and for the designation of a new manager in the event of the termination of employment of any such manager. The House bill contained no such provision, except in the case of corporations, firms, or associations with more than one place of business. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

INTERRELATION OF MANUFACTURER OR WHOLESALER AND PERMITTEE

The House bill prohibited any manufacturer or wholesaler having any direct or indirect financial interest in the business of a permittee. Under the Senate amendment if any manufacturer or wholesaler has any substantial financial interest, direct or indirect, in the business of any "on-sale" or "off-sale" permittee, or in the premises on which such business is conducted, the permit may, in the discretion of the Commissioners, be revoked. The Senate amendment also provides that no manufacturer or wholesaler shall rent, lend, or give to any permittee, or to the owner of the premises on which he conducts his business, any money or property to assist in the conduct of the business. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

REPORTS OF SALES

The House bill required all permittees to submit a monthly report showing the quantity of beverages purchased during the preceding month. The Senate amendment omitted that provision and required a monthly report of sales to be made by "on-sale" and "off-sale" permittees. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

COLLECTION OF TAXES

The House bill provided that the tax imposed on the sale of beverages should be paid on or before the 15th day of each month. The Senate amendment fixed the 10th day of the month, the same day as that required for the making of reports of sales, as the day on which such taxes shall be paid. The conference agreement retains the Senate provision.

SALES BY OUTSIDE MANUFACTURER

The House bill prohibited any manufacturer of beverages outside the District of Columbia from bringing into the District and selling or offering for sale to permittees any beverage without first obtaining a permit from the Commissioners and agreeing to submit a monthly report, under oath, of the quantity of beverages shipped into the District. The Senate amendment prohibits any "on-sale" or "off-sale" permittee from purchasing any beverage from any manufacturer or wholesaler doing business outside the District of Columbia and not holding a permit issued under the act, and transporting or causing the same to be transported into the District for resale, unless such manufacturer or wholesaler has a certificate of approval from the Commissioners. Such certificate is to be granted only on condition that the manufacturer or wholesaler agrees to furnish to the assessor a monthly report under oath showing the quantity of the beverages sold or delivered to "on-sale" and "off-sale" permittees, and may be revoked by the Commissioners in case such report is not furnished. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

REVOCATION OF PERMITS

The House bill provided that in case of revocation of a permit upon conviction of the permittee for violation of the act, no license could ever be issued to such permittee, and no license could be issued in respect of the premises of such permittee for a period of 6 months. The Senate amendment provides that in case of such revocation the permittee cannot receive another permit for the period of 3 years. The House bill, in case of revocation of a permit by the Commissioners, provided that such revocation be for a period of 1 year. The Senate amendment places no limitation on renewal or reissuance in such case. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SALES TO MINORS

The House bill made it unlawful to sell any beverages at any licensed place to persons under 18 years of age. Under the Senate amendment, it is unlawful for an "off-sale" permittee to give or sell or for an "on-sale" permittee to give, sell, or serve any beverage to any person under 18 years of age. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

PENALTIES

The House bill provided for the maximum penalties of a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, and the Senate amendment fixes a maximum fine of $500 and the maximum imprisonment of 6 months, or both. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

The Senate amendment adds a "separability" clause protecting the validity of the remainder of the act in the event that any provision of it is held invalid. This provision is retained in the conference agreement.

EFFECTIVE DATE

The House bill provided that the act should take effect April 7, 1933. Under the Senate amendment, the bill will take effect immediately upon enactment, but sales or offer for sales will be unlawful prior to April 7, 1933. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

MARY T. NORTON,
VINCENT L. PALMISANO,
LORING M. BLACK, JR.,
JAS. L. WHITLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STALKER] and 30 minutes to myself. I will take 5 minutes to explain a few of the provisions contained in the Senate amendments. I call attention to the conference report and suggest that if Members are interested they will find therein a complete explanation of the changes that have been made.

To summarize these changes, I may say that the club dues have been changed from $15 to $6. The reason for that was because the $15 dues would preclude a great many respectable clubs in the District from selling beer—clubs that have been in the District for many years.

Another provision is the change from 6 months to 2 months in the length of time restaurants would be required to be in business in the District before they could be granted a license. Still another provision is the inclusion of wine and fruit juices.

Another provision is not to permit the sale in drugstores and delicatessens unless in a separate room reserved exclusively for the serving of food.

Again, the brewer is to have but one "off-sale" permit. He cannot have an "off-sale" permit and an "on-sale" permit at the same time with respect to the same premises.

Then there is the amendment on page 1 of the conference report that it shall be within the discretion of the Commissioners whether any permit under the act shall be issued for the sale of any such beverages in any building in the District of Columbia owned or leased by the United States and used for the transaction of public business.

Mr. TARVER. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TARVER. As the bill passed the House, it was in such form that the District Commissioners had no discretion to permit the sale of beer in the Capitol. It was admitted in the argument on the bill that the Capitol, and perhaps other public buildings, were in the control of the administrative authorities of the Government, that the Capitol was in the control of the authorities of the House and the Senate having jurisdiction.

The bill as amended in conference proposes to vest in the District Commissioners authority to permit sale of beer in the Capitol, which they did not have under the House bill. I therefore, from the standpoint of one who does not believe in such sale in the Capitol, think that the conference report is infinitely worse than the House bill.

Mrs. NORTON. But the House bill did give the District Commissioners that authority.

Mr. TARVER. It was admitted in the debate on the House bill that the Commissioners had no jurisdiction in the Capitol, but these conferees have given them jurisdiction.

Mrs. NORTON. But they really did have the jurisdiction, just the same. The Committee on Accounts has the authority to decide what shall or shall not be sold in the Capitol. I believe every Member of this House is as jealous of his or her reputation as is the gentleman from Georgia and shall guard the privileges contained in this bill.

Mr. TARVER. I think the lady is certainly mistaken as to the District Commissioners' having any jurisdiction in the Capitol.

Mrs. NORTON. If the gentleman will examine the bill, he will find that is not so. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything else in this conference report that requires any explanation. I would suggest that the House is so tired of the subject of beer that it seems no longer necessary to maintain order when the subject is under consideration and this makes it difficult to be heard. However, we hope to get rid of the subject today for all time. It has been going on for 13 years in some form or other, but the end is in sight.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill will be signed in the White House today, and shortly thereafter we will have beer sold in this Capitol. But it will not be by my vote. Speaking only for myself as one of the 435 Members of this House, I have done everything within the power of one mortal man to stop efforts to repeal the eighteenth amendment. I have done everything within the power of one mortal man to stop the passage of the beer bill. I have done everything in the power of mortal man to prevent the taking of restrictions off of medicinal liquor, and I have done everything one man could do to stop beer from being sold in Washington and in this Capitol Building.

When I came here 17 years ago there were 300 open saloons in the city of Washington. There had been 500, but there had been such a scandal in Washington as to the indecent manner in which they were being run that the people of this great city rebelled, and they had them reduced to 300. By passing this beer bill only God knows how many beer "joints" will open up in Washington.

I am awfully sorry that this amendment proposed in conference has been adopted by our conferees and by the Senate and is to be adopted here, which allows the District Commissioners to determine whether this beer is to be sold or not in Government buildings.

If we could, we would stop it. But we cannot. We had a test vote here the other day on the question of permitting beer to be sold in public buildings, and 150 sincere Members of this House, who do not believe in it, registered their names in protest against it.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just one moment. At present the District Commissioners, who are not in any way responsible to the people of the United States, have no control whatever over any Government building in Washington. It is right that they should not have control over the Government buildings in Washington. It was never intended by the Constitution that the District Commissioners, in no way responsible to the people, should have any control whatever over the people's buildings in the city of Washington.

For the first time in the history of the United States it is proposed by this bill to give the Commissioners control over the Capitol Building and over every one of the other many Government buildings scattered all over the city of Washington. It is left to them to decide whether or not they will license beer to be sold in the cloakroom and in the restaurant and in different other parts of this great Capitol.

Are you in favor of that? I wish that we could vote down this conference report. Every wet in this House could very well decently vote down the conference report. The wettest wet in this House could consistently and conscientiously vote down the conference report and send this back to the committee with instructions that they take this power they are lodging in the hands of the Commissioners away from the Commissioners and put it back into the Congress of the United States.

It has been held by Congress that a Commissioner of the District of Columbia is not impeachable. No matter what a Commissioner does in the city of Washington, Congress cannot impeach him. He is an unimpeachable officer. He could violate his duty in every respect and yet the Congress cannot impeach him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman from New York yield me a little time?

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I am grateful to my friend for doing so. Why not vote down this conference report? I am going to ask for a rising vote, so if enough of you wets who believe in decent management of this wet question in the city of Washington will come along with us and vote down the conference report, we can send the beer bill back to the conference committee and have that committee take the control of Government buildings out of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and put it back in the Congress, and let the bill come back here and then, if you insist on it, pass it, for you have the votes to pass it, and send it to the White House this evening in a proper manner.

Mr. Speaker, you are going to see the time come when there is going to be a scandal in this building. You will see the time come when even wet constituents will feel outraged at some of the indecencies that could occur in this Capitol if you put beer joints here.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mrs. NORTON. Does not the gentleman trust his colleagues to use this privilege properly here in the Capitol?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, in my years of experience I have had those who were dear to my heart, in whom I had perfect confidence, yet who did not have control over their own actions. I did not have control over these loved ones. I cannot forget. I have confidence and respect and love for every colleague with whom I serve here. I have nothing but the best wishes for each and all of my colleagues. But thousands of people come in this Capitol daily. What control do we have over their personal actions? I know that there will be scandal here in this building if you put beer for sale in the Capitol, for it is intoxicating beer that is to be sold. Sooner or later you will have scandals here that will shock this Nation.

Mrs. NORTON. Of course, the gentleman will admit that 3.2 beer is not intoxicating?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I know it is intoxicating. I know it. You cannot tell me. I have seen it perform. I have seen many people drunk on 3.2 percent beer. I have seen them drunk on beer of less than 3 percent alcoholic content by weight. I have helped put them to bed late at night. [Laughter.] I know something about it. You cannot tell me this beer is not intoxicating. I know it is. The Senate knew it. The Senate first put this restriction in the bill to prevent its sale in Government buildings. Why did they put it in? They knew this beer was intoxicating. Why did 150 Members of this House the other day vote their names on record against selling beer in this Capitol? They knew it was intoxicating. They knew that scandals would come up. But our House conferees made the Senate back up and allow beer to be sold in Government buildings.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Let me tell my friend this before I yield; and then, if I have time, I will gladly yield. Do you not know that every newspaper in Washington with their representatives sitting in that gallery never misses an opportunity to try to embarrass Members of Congress? You let something happen in this Capitol or in Washington that is connected with a Congressman or a member of a Congressman's family or any of your secretarial force, even in the remotest way, and they will twist you without any mercy. They will play you up on the front page in scary headlines and box-car type.

Only last week the Washington newspapers heralded in a most sensational manner that a female relative of one of our distinguished and highly respected colleagues had been found in an intoxicated condition on Connecticut Avenue and arrested and carried to the police station under the charge of drinking 3 glasses of beer. Last Sunday the newspapers of Washington heralded in a sensational manner that the secretary driving the car of one of our highly esteemed colleagues had run into a street car, injuring several people. And today the Washington newspapers in box-car type and sensational headlines herald: "Police Insult Representative"; "Overzealous Motor Cop Halts Congressman and Causes Traffic Jam." And notwithstanding that our colleague was wholly blameless and accompanied by female relatives and the police action was dastardly, infamous, and absolutely without excuse or reason—he and his companions were insulted and grossly mistreated—yet this press of Washington ridicules our good friend as follows:

MEMBER OF CONGRESS YESTERDAY ENCOUNTERED HIS FIRST EMBARRASSING MOMENT WHEN INSULTED BY AN OVERZEALOUS MOTORCYCLE POLICEMAN

It took 6 policemen, a traffic jam, an excited crowd of more than 200 persons, and a hectic session redundant with diplomacy at the first precinct police station before the question was settled.

HURRYING HOME

Hurrying home from the Capitol with his sister and her chum, Representative ——— became aware, at Fourteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW., of a motorcycle policeman shouting for him to pull over. The Representative said:

"Why?"

Policeman Cleota Langdon said:

"Pull over."

That kept up until they reached Fourteenth and H Streets, where Representative ——— stopped for a red light. There he explained to the policeman that he had violated no law or traffic regulation and that he was a Representative in a hurry.

Policeman Langdon tugged ——— for a while, but the latter would not budge. Came the reserves. Came diplomacy. The Representative budged and willingly rode to the first precinct in a patrol wagon to settle the matter. By this time the traffic jam was terrific and so was the crowd.

Flanked by seven policemen, Representative ——— walked into the station house, made a few telephone calls, and the ears of police officials grew red. It was all a great big mistake, they explained, and the Representative should go free.

And today the police department sent most profuse apologies to our colleague for their dastardly atrocious treatment of him. But apologies do not offset such insults. And these newspapers will unhesitatingly play any of us up under just such slight pretexts; hence it behooves us all to give them no occasion whatever for it. Of course, if a Member of Congress does wrong, he should be treated just as everyone else is treated. But he should not be mistreated just because he happens to be a representative of the people.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, we on the District Committee are very glad that the discussion of beer and legislation on beer is drawing to a close. It is not much of an argument for the conference report to tell you that if you adopt the report the lives of the members of the District Committee may be saved. If you were a member of the District Committee, you could not move 50 feet in the District without somebody asking you, "How about beer?" Last night the worst almost happened, so far as I am concerned. I was in the barber's chair, and just as the barber had his razor on my throat he said, "Congressman, do we get beer on the 7th?" [Laughter.] So we are very anxious to have this report adopted for personal reasons.

We have done the best we could with the Senate on the conflict between the two Houses. The important point of compromise was on the sale of beer in the Capitol. I do not anticipate any of the scandals which the gentleman from Texas is worrying about. If he can stand some of the scandals of the last 12 years, I guess he can stand whatever will happen in the future with beer being sold.

This does not give the District Commissioners control over the Capitol, but in order to get beer into the Capitol, because of other provisions in the act concerning brewers' sales only to those with permits, it was necessary to have a permit in the Capitol restaurant. The Senate was opposed to the sale in public buildings, and this was the best compromise we could work out. The Senate does not have to have beer on the Senate side. The House does not have to have it on this side; but if the House asks for a permit and gets it, we will have an unusual attendance of Senators in the House lunch room. On the other hand, if they do and we do not, we will flow over there.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. I notice the gentleman said the Senate was opposed to the sale of beer in the Capitol. Is it not true, however, fortunately or unfortunately, depending upon the viewpoint of the person considering it, that the conferees appointed on the part of the Senate were in accord with the gentleman's position and not in accord with the position of the Senate; and that therefore, at the conference, there was no compromise, no effort to consider the position of the Senate, but merely a proposal to make infinitely worse the House provision?

Mr. BLACK. It is quite apparent to me that the conferees on the part of the Senate on this bill were the most reasonable set of conferees that I ever met with in conference. I dislike to think we are going to force beer down the throats of the Senators, but I think they will not object very much.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BROWNING. Is it not a rather dangerous precedent for us to give the District Commissioners control of the public buildings?

Mr. BLACK. We are not going to give them control.

Mr. BROWNING. Do we not have to go to the District Commissioners and ask permission to do something with respect to Government buildings?

Mr. BLACK. The District Commissioners have no right, unless we ask them, to put a permit in. Then their right is limited. We can ask the District Commissioners to come here or the police department or the fire department to come here. Now, we are asking whatever this department is to bring some beer here.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote to concur in the conference report, but I admit I do so reluctantly. This may be the last time I shall ever take the floor to discuss beer. I hope it is. I have fought for it for 10 years. This bill does not satisfy me, and I know it does not satisfy many others who have worked with me for years for relief from the oppression of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act.

I was surprised on Monday when I saw most of the "dry" Members of the House follow the leadership of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and vote for a beer bill which was too wet for me. I could not vote for the bill in the condition it was in on Monday because it was just too "wet." The Senate had stricken out practically all the restrictions that we had put in the bill in the House, to preserve conditions so that we would not jeopardize the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Where the House provided that the Commissioners shall have the right to revoke a license for a violation, the Senate put in the word "may." Where the House provided that a man violating a license should forever be prevented from having a permit, the Senate placed in a provision, first, of a probation of 1 year and then of 3 years.

The Senate struck out my amendment adopted in the House that if there was a violation, no license should be granted on the premises for 6 months. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the State of New York, which most people believe is quite a wet State, they are in the process of enacting a beer bill. Among its penalties is a provision that whoever violates a license will never get another license, and the particular premises will not get a license for 5 years. Yet the Senate was so liberal that they would permit a saloon up every back alley to continue in spite of violations, for they struck out these restrictive provisions.

My amendment as to club dues was adopted in the House. It provided that the club must be a real club charging $15 or more a year dues. The Senate reduced the amount to $6. I do not complain about the amount. The amendment adopted by the House provided that the dues must be payable in one sum in advance, to prevent a so-called "club" organizing and saying the dues are $6, but you can pay 50 cents down or nothing and you are now a member. There is no protection in such a club provision as the Senate emasculated. It will encourage wildcat clubs.

I will not say the action of the Senate in this matter was ill considered. It must have been deliberate.

Now, I have no sympathy at all with the proposition of giving the Commissioners of the District of Columbia any jurisdiction over this Capitol Building. I think it is fundamentally wrong, but the conferees agreed to do it.

The $100 license fee for retailers should have been increased to at least $250. In the State of New York the license fee will be $1,200 or at least $1,000. With a fee of $100 for a license you will have a saloon up every back alley.

I have always approached this subject from two standpoints. I have no interest in the fellow who is going to make the profit. I have two interests only: To restore beer to the people who are entitled to it, and to obtain revenue for the Government. This bill is not going to obtain revenue in the District of Columbia, and I fear it is going to open up the door too wide, because of the liberal attitude of the Senate in striking out the restrictions the House put in the bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman states that under the provisions of the bill we will have a saloon in every alley. I was under the impression the gentleman was opposed to the saloon and was going to do everything he could to prohibit the saloon from coming back in the District and in the States.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not think many people have done more to try to prohibit the evils of the old saloon than I have. I want to see this business of selling beer conducted differently from what it was before prohibition. I want to see people get beer at a reasonable price under decent, wholesome conditions; but with a $10 license fee and others unlimited provisions in this bill, you are just not going to have a safe situation.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in New York the license fee will be $1,200?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. May I have 5 additional minutes?

Mr. STALKER. I am glad to yield to my dry colleague from New York 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PALMISANO. Does the gentleman believe that with a $1,200 license fee in the State of New York the people there will be able to obtain for 5 cents a glass of beer containing more than 6 ounces, which is less than the contents of a bottle of coca cola?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am glad the gentleman asked this question. I shall answer it, because I was coming right to that point.

I have been taken to task before for saying that there was going to be profiteering in the sale of beer. Let me say to the gentleman from Maryland he is not going to have a 5-cent glass of beer until competition knocks out the profiteering. I have said before that the first beer from the breweries will be brought out at $25 a barrel, and people here took me to task for my prediction. According to the press, it is going to be $33 a barrel, because the papers announced that the brewers are going to sell beer at $2.40 a case.

Before prohibition beer never cost over $1 a case of 24 bottles, and most of it cost 90 cents. The only additional cost now is the new tax, which will amount to 36 cents a case. The cost of material and the cost of labor have greatly decreased since before prohibition. So by no stretch of reasonable profiteering could anybody charge more than $1.50 a case, and it should be about $1.25. I hope the American people will refuse to buy beer that costs more than $1.50 a case.

At $2.40 a case it amounts to $33 a barrel. Before prohibition a barrel of beer never sold for more than $6, with a $1 tax on it. With $5 tax which we are putting on now the cost should be $11, instead of the $18 or $20 or $25 reported in the press.

Now, this is what the American people face, and I hope on Friday of this week, when beer is legalized, the American people will not pay over $1.50 at the most for a case of beer. If they do they are yielding to profiteers.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How are they going to get it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. How are they going to get it? Just do not buy it until the price comes down. I have never approached this question in the sense that time was of the essence of the matter. I do not care whether they have beer this Friday or next Friday. I want to have a good beer bill, pending the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

I think this beer bill is worse than no beer bill. In the beginning we talked as though we were going to have a model beer bill in the District of Columbia that the States would follow. No State in the Union would accept this beer bill as a model. I trust when it is tried out the officials will come back here and ask for reasonable amendments so that the sale of this nonintoxicating beer in the District of Columbia will not jeopardize the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

OPPOSED TO SALOONS IN THE CAPITAL

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Some time ago an effort was made to pass a bill providing for the sale of intoxicating beer in the District of Columbia, and I opposed its passage. I told the Committee on the District of Columbia that when a law had been enacted permitting the sale of 3.2 beer in the States I would not do anything to unduly obstruct the passage of a similar law by filibuster or otherwise for the District of Columbia. I was and am now opposed to the passage of a 3.2 beer bill for the Nation and for the District of Columbia. Each Member of Congress takes an oath to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. The oath applies to the amendments to the Constitution the same as it does to the original Constitution. The eighteenth amendment to the Constitution says that the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes is prohibited.

HEARING BEFORE COMMITTEE

A hearing lasting 3 or 4 days was held before a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia on the question of the sale of beer in the District. I was a member of that subcommittee, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO] was chairman. During that time the question of the intoxicating quality of the beverage was discussed. Does this bill represent a legislative lie? No one will say that beer of an alcoholic content of 3.2 per cent is not intoxicating; 3.2 beer by weight is 4 per cent beer by volume. It is the same as the 8 spirit proof beer in Canada.

About the strongest beer that is made and dispensed in Canada to individuals in private residences and to guests in hotel rooms is 8 spirit proof. The sale of this beer over the counter is prohibited in Canada. The kind of beer that is sold in eating places is the 4.4 spirit proof which is the same as 2.2 by volume and 2 percent or less than 2 percent by weight. So this will be what would be known in Canada as "8 proof spirit beer." It is stronger than most of the beer that was made before prohibition. The Ways and Means Committee in its report on the 3.2 beer bill would not say that the beverage was nonintoxicating; they said: "The alcohol in 3.2-percent beer is so diluted that it would require considerable effort on the part of an average person to drink enough to become drunk." Notice the terms "average person", "considerable effort", and "drunk." It is admitted that the average person can get drunk on it if he makes the proper effort. Are we going to say that he will not make the effort? The brewers, including Mr. Anheuser Busch, unanimously recommended 3.2 beer; they did not want a higher percentage. Do you think they would want it if it is not intoxicating?

INTOXICATING

No one can get around the fact that this beer is intoxicating. It is intoxicating. If there is a Member of this House who believes that the beer is not intoxicating, I am willing to yield to that Member now and for him to get up and say that the beer is not intoxicating.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to say that.

Mr. CELLER. I will say that also.

Mrs. NORTON. I am willing to say it is not intoxicating.

Mr. BLANTON. That is New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut.

Mr. PATMAN. These three, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS], the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] are willing to certify that it is not intoxicating. They are 3 out of a membership of 435, and the only ones who are willing to say that the beer is not intoxicating after I have paused for an answer.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I will make the statement also.

A number of Members on each side of the House rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is going to have his colleagues testify here, he ought to put them under oath. [Laughter.]

Mr. PATMAN. I think other Members have arisen more as evidence of loyalty to the cause than as witnesses to the nonintoxicating qualities of the beer; they did not stand when there was a pause for that purpose. I want to say to those who are willing to testify that this beer is not intoxicating that they are willing to say something that the brewers would not say, they are willing to say something that the brewers' lawyers would not say, and they are willing to say something that no witness appearing before any committee has ever said unequivocally. If it is not intoxicating, why make it a violation of the law for it to be sold to minors under 18 years of age? Why require a license from anyone before offering it for sale? Why not sell it everywhere just like coca cola is sold if it is not intoxicating? The strict requirements attending its sale dispute the assertion that it is not intoxicating.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a brief question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee by brewers and their attorneys and experts was that it is not intoxicating.

Mr. PATMAN. I beg to disagree with the gentleman, they did not say unequivocally that the beer was nonintoxicating; they had much to say about it requiring a large quantity to intoxicate certain people if consumed along with a certain amount of food, and under certain conditions. I read every word of that testimony, and I was impressed that they never would unequivocally say that 3.2-percent beer is not intoxicating. They artfully evaded—just like Members of Congress have evaded—a direct answer to such a question. I repeat, the rigid requirements for its sale, including making it a criminal offense for anyone to sell the beverage to minors, and the heavy tax imposed for its sale, disputes any assertion that a nonintoxicating beverage is being discussed.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question.

Mr. PATMAN. Not just now.

Mr. CELLER. I simply want to say that Prof. Yandell Henderson, of Yale, so testified.

VOTE ON QUESTION OF OPEN SALOONS IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. BLANTON. And another professor from Yale denied it.

Mr. PATMAN. Prof. Yandell Henderson used the terms, before the committee, "virtually nonintoxicating" and "should not be defined by law as intoxicating" and similar terms. Another thing, you would not want the beer unless it was intoxicating. The brewers admitted it is intoxicating, and there is no dispute about it. So the question is whether you are going to have an open saloon in the Capitol of the United States. Whether you are going to have an open saloon in the District of Columbia is a different question to having an open saloon in the Capitol of the United States. Here we are, 435 Representatives in Congress, assembled for the purpose of giving the people of this Nation economic relief. With more distress and suffering existing in our country today than ever before in its history, is our answer to these suffering millions going to be that we are going to have open saloons here in the Capitol of the United States, in order that we may soberly, and with better judgment, legislate and otherwise pass upon their grave problems?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. If the gentleman is in doubt as to whether or not the beer is intoxicating——

Mr. PATMAN. There is no doubt about the intoxicating qualities of the beer.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman will be able to demonstrate that for himself if he tries it out next Friday.

SPEAKER'S JURISDICTION OVER HOUSE REMOVED

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman can demonstrate for himself. There is no doubt in my mind about 3.2 beer, by weight, being intoxicating.

The question involved here is this. The Speaker of the House is supposed to have jurisdiction over the House. The Committee on Accounts has jurisdiction over the House restaurant. This report changes the law entirely, and under this conference report the District Commissioners will be allowed to grant a license to sell beer in the House restaurant, or in other parts of the House wing of the Capitol. The District Commissioners will be permitted to grant a license to sell beer in the House cloakroom, on the floor of the House, or in any other place here, thereby taking the jurisdiction away from the Speaker of the House and from the Committee on Accounts and placing such jurisdiction in three Commissioners who are not elected by the people and who are in no way responsible to the people of the States.

THIS IS A DIRECT VOTE ON OPEN SALOONS IN THE CAPITOL

So the question involved is whether you are willing to give up this jurisdiction. Do you not think it is passing the buck? Do you not think it is saying that we want to give the District Commissioners jurisdiction so they will put open saloons in the Capitol of the United States, and we will not be charged with such responsibility. You may say that, but you will be charged with responsibility. This is a direct vote on the question. If you vote "aye" on this conference report you vote in favor of open saloons in the Capitol. If you vote "no" you are in favor of striking out the provision in the conference report that permits saloons to be established in the Capitol.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to a member of the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. PATMAN. In just a minute.

OUR ANSWER TO THE HUNGRY

Let us vote down this conference report and then let it be amended so as to strike out the provision which permits the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to have jurisdiction over the Capitol Building of the United States, and then if you want to, pass it, and the President can sign it this afternoon and it will become a law; but let us not place open saloons in the Capitol of the United States when there are millions of people crying for bread. We should not answer their pleas of agony and distress by telling them that we can be in a better position to solve their problems, and thereby restore the country to a prosperous condition, if a saloon bar is placed in the Capitol at the disposal of the Members of the House. People in Washington should not be celebrating; they should be in mourning; men, women, and children in this Nation, through no fault of their own, are starving. Let us not answer them that we cannot work effectively and efficiently in their behalf unless we are surrounded with saloon bars dispensing intoxicating liquors. [Applause.]

TEST CASE

Suppose a customer at one of these bars consumes too much of this intoxicating beverage and death is produced. Suppose the surviving widow and orphans institute a civil suit against the owners of the establishment making the sale and against the brewer who manufactured it. They will plead in defense that the law permits the sale; the plaintiffs will answer that its sale was in violation of the Constitution of the United States, because the beverage sold was intoxicating. If the jury finds that the beverage was intoxicating, a verdict for damages in favor of the plaintiffs will probably be upheld by the courts. The same situation will develop in the case of a driver of an automobile who is drunk on this beverage causing damage to the life or property of another person and in innumerable other cases. Possibly the dispensers and manufacturers of this beverage will escape criminal prosecution and punishment, but can they escape being held liable in a civil action for damages?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO].

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, it is somewhat amusing to hear Members discuss the various items in this bill. I will first take up the question whether you can obtain a license to sell beer in the Capitol without the acquiescence of the Speaker and the Vice President.

In the first place, we have no one to whom the license would be issued. Everyone here in this building is an employee of the House or of the Senate, and for that reason there is no one who could obtain a license, because they are nothing but employees. I think that should be a sufficient answer to that question.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] says that there are only three in the House that would say that this beer is not intoxicating. I think the record of this House shows that there are about 300 Members who would say that it is not intoxicating.

Mr. GOSS. When the gentleman from Texas asked that question only three Members answered, but there were nearly 200 who stood up on the floor.

Mr. PALMISANO. If you listened to the gentleman from Texas, you would think that we were going to have back here the green-hat man, who is known as the bootlegger of the District.

Now, coming to the question about the license fee. I say to you that I do not believe that you will have 150 places selling beer in the city, outside of hotels, under this license.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] talks about a $25 barrel of beer. In Baltimore they are going to sell it for $12 a barrel—$1.50 and $1.75 a case. Under these conditions they cannot sell an 8-ounce glass of beer for 5 cents.

If in the State of New York they have adopted a $1,200 license fee, I want to say to the gentleman from New York that if they will enforce the law and not permit gin and other liquors sold on the premises they will not be able to exist.

I know something about the beer business. Take a 30-gallon barrel and divide it by 8-ounce glasses and you will find how many glasses you get. You will get, I think, in 8-ounce glasses, about $24. There is no place that will be able to sell more than a barrel a day, and under this law, $100 license, if you sell a barrel you will be taxed an additional dollar. In other words, a dollar for every barrel, which makes $312 a year. In other words, it would produce $24 a barrel, $12 you pay for the beer and $1.50 a day you pay for your license.

What are you going to get for the overhead, your rent, and employees? Under that provision you must sell 2 barrels a day, and that means a thousand dollars a year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is narrowed down to the sale of beer on Government property. The matter of public sale in the District of Columbia has been agreed to by both Houses and is not an issue here. The only remaining question to be decided is whether it shall be sold in the Capitol and other Federal buildings, and it occurs to me in this connection that the House might be interested in a little reminiscence which includes a reference to Speaker Champ Clark, of Missouri, who presided over the House from the Sixty-second to the Sixty-fifth Congress.

For a number of years it was my duty to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, beginning with the RECORDS of the Fifty-ninth Congress, some 30 years ago, and coming down, page by page, to the present time.

One day, toward the end of his last term, I said to Mr. Clark, "Mr. Speaker, it is rather remarkable that throughout the early RECORDS there are frequent references to altercations on the floor between Members of the House. Apparently physical encounters between Members, often accompanied by an exchange of inkstands or other missiles, were of ordinary occurrence, and it was a common practice for the Presiding Officer to direct the Sergeant at Arms to carry the mace to the floor. But since I have been here I do not recall an instance of this character and I have seen the mace carried to the floor only twice in that time." The Speaker said, "Oh, that is very easily explained. In those days there was a bar downstairs, next to the restaurant, and the boys would go down and tank up and then come up here on the floor and express themselves."

In view of this statement by a man who served for 30 years in the House, may I not respectfully suggest to my friends in charge of this measure and interested in the repeal of the eighteenth amendment that the end sought may be achieved a little sooner and a little more certainly if they will retain the restrictions which were observed here in the Capitol before the passage of the eighteenth amendment. You are proposing here to swing the pendulum from one extreme to the other. Why not observe moderation and adopt a happy medium rather than jeopardize your case in the very beginning of the campaign?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. If this conference report is agreed upon, who would be in a position to apply for permission to sell beer in the Capitol of the United States? Almost all the people here are employees of the House or the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. The Commissioners of the District are not limited to employees of the House or Senate. They have the power to issue licenses to any person.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are they on the pay roll?

Mr. BLANTON. Naturally, they are not. But this bill permits the Commissioners to grant licenses to anybody.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. To ask the gentleman what parliamentary procedure would be necessary at this stage of the passage of the beer bill in order to give the House an opportunity to vote on this proposition separated from the other provisions in the conference report.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Oh, of course there is only one way to reach it. If the report is not agreed to it then goes back to the conferees, and an instruction would prevent sale in the Capitol without interfering with sale elsewhere in the District and the city.

Mr. BLANTON. And if the House would vote down this conference report, then it can instruct the conference committee to take this provision out of the bill that lets the Commissioners issue licenses to sell beer in Government buildings. We then can take that provision out of the bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman did not answer my question. Who of the employees would be empowered to apply to sell beer in the Capitol of the United States?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] is in charge of the bill and is thoroughly familiar with all phases of it, and I am certain will be glad to enlighten the gentleman on that point.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more in order to ask him a question. Of course the gentleman knows that in the final analysis the Committee on Accounts will have the last word as to whether or not beer shall be sold in this Capitol. It could not be sold without this consent.

Mr. BLANTON. But this bill repeals the law so far as licenses to sell beer is concerned and takes control of this Capitol that far out of the hands of the Committee on Accounts.

Mrs. NORTON. It does nothing of the kind. It could not do that. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, in the brief month that I have had opportunity to serve in this body I have made the acquaintance of a great many splendid gentlemen, and I have not met a more likeable character than TOM BLANTON, of Texas. However, when I hear him this afternoon from the well of the House speak unkindly and unfairly against the press, then I feel as a former active newspaperman that I should rise in defense of that profession.

In the important work of restoring confidence, President Roosevelt has been enthusiastically supported by the press. Through the cooperation of news-disseminating agencies the message of our leader has been brought close home to the hearthstones of the American people.

The large majority of newspaper reporters will measure up favorably with any other group when considered from the standpoint of ability, energy, fair play, and the consideration for varying views of individuals. Those who chronicle the daily happenings touch the very pulse of American thought and action and carry it to a waiting world. A newspaperman by the name of Sprague has given us the following dynamic picture of the daily newspaper:

> Turn to the press, its teeming sheets survey,
> Big with the wonders of each passing day.
> Births, deaths, weddings, forgeries, fires, and wrecks,
> Harangues and hailstones, brawls and broken necks.
> Trade hardly deems the busy day begun,
> Till his keen eye along the page has run.
> The blooming daughter throws her needle by,
> And reads her schoolmate's marriage with a sigh.
> While the grave mother puts her glasses on,
> And sheds a tear for some old crony gone.
> The preacher, too, his Sunday theme lays down,
> To see what last new folly fills the town.
> Lively or sad, life's meanest, mightiest things,
> The fate of fighting cocks and fighting kings.

Mr. Speaker, it may seem an unimportant matter for me to recite those few lines, but I want to say that I believe the press of this country has had a great deal to do with the progress of America, and I believe I speak the sentiments not only of my own heart but of the membership of this body when I say that I have high regard for the press of this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this conference report.

When this beer bill was first introduced in the House I opposed it upon the ground that the beer allowed to be manufactured under the bill was intoxicating, and therefore such a measure is unconstitutional. I am still of the opinion that 3.2 beer is intoxicating and should not be permitted to be sold anywhere in the United States. Especially should its sale be prohibited in the Capitol Building at Washington.

When this bill was pending in the House an amendment was offered to same which would prohibit the sale of beer on any Government property in the District of Columbia. This amendment was voted down by the House, but when the bill reached the Senate the amendment was added. When the bill came back to the House for its concurrence in the amendment the House refused to concur. This placed the measure in the hands of a conference committee, composed of Members of the Senate and House. This conference committee compromised upon the amendment by placing in the bill authority for the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to say whether or not beer should be sold in the Capitol Building and upon other Government property in Washington. Since the establishment of the Capital of the United States in the District of Columbia Congress has exercised absolute control over all governmental property, and when this bill is passed it takes the control of the Government property, insofar as the sale of beer is concerned, out of the hands of Congress and places it within the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Such proceedings as this are unheard of, and it is unbelievable to the average person that a Congress could have been elected by the people of these United States who would take the control of the Government's property out of the hands of the legally elected representatives of the people and place it in the hands of three Commissioners in the District of Columbia, who no doubt will be largely influenced by the brewery interests of the District.

Why so much noise and furor and rush to pass this beer bill? The brewers of the United States are now authorized to manufacture all the beer they can possibly produce that they themselves admit is not intoxicating. The fact is when the eighteenth amendment was adopted the reason for making the alcoholic content in beer one half of 1 percent was the statement of brewers that beer containing a larger percent of alcohol would be intoxicating. Therefore, the brewers know that the beer permitted to be manufactured under this bill is intoxicating, and that is the reason for the rush to pass this measure through Congress, for, as all know, the brewers are now permitted to manufacture beer, but not of 3.2 alcoholic content.

I am quite sure that even antiprohibitionists who believe that right should prevail will oppose such a measure as this, and I am hoping this conference report, which will establish a saloon in the Capitol of this Nation, will not be adopted.

Mr. STALKER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the conference report. I realize, however, that this House is overwhelmingly wet. I predict this is the wettest Congress we will ever have. The pendulum swings both ways and it will swing back to a dry Congress. However, this bill is not 100 percent defective. This bill has a tendency to prohibit the sale of beer to minors and Members of Congress. [Laughter.]

I repeat that I am opposed to the conference report and I hope it will be voted down.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] is recognized for 4½ minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the opponents of this conference report that I am willing to abide by the restrictions in the White House. Mrs. Roosevelt, although a teetotaler, has indicated to the country and the world that beer will be served in the White House. Why then should it not be served in this House of Representatives and in the Senate?

Professor Henderson, of Yale University, indicated in no uncertain terms that this 3.2 beer was nonintoxicating. I am willing to accept the version of an expert rather than a nonexpert, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], on that score. I trust the Members of this House. I am willing that they shall have beer served here. I have confidence in their sobriety, in the moderation of the Membership of this House. I say if you take the words of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], you indicate a calumny upon the Membership of this House. I trust the Members. They are not going to abuse their beer privileges.

When there were bars in the House and in the Senate the Nation rose to the acme of prosperity and greatness. Beer never prevented the Members from doing their duty and rendering a splendid service that contributed to that greatness and that prosperity. I need but mention some of the former Members of this Chamber and the other Chamber who were unafraid and who were willing to imbibe and who did imbibe. I refer to Thomas Jefferson, who advocated with all his eloquence the drinking of beer in this country rather than hard liquor, and yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would fly in the face of what Jefferson said.

I refer to Madison and to the great Calhoun and Webster and Clay, all of whom imbibed freely in the bars of this House, and the Nation did not suffer thereby. I refer to Lincoln himself, who ran a tavern, who had a license to sell beer. What was good enough for Lincoln is good enough for the Members of this House. I refer to the great luminaries like Speaker Reed and McKinley, great Members of this House. If they were here today, they would inveigh most strongly against the provision that there shall be no nonintoxicating beer sold in the restaurants of this House.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the gentleman mean to infer that Lincoln was a user of intoxicating liquor?

Mr. CELLER. I said Lincoln was the holder of a tavern license to sell intoxicating beverages. I will say more than that. When the brothers of temperance came to Washington to complain about some of the actions of General Grant on the score that he was imbibing too freely, Lincoln said to the brothers, "Please tell me the brand of that liquor. I want to send a barrelful of it to some of my other generals."

Mr. DONDERO. Does the gentleman know that a partner of Lincoln was the man who imposed that license on that firm?

Mr. CELLER. I do not care whether it was imposed on him or not. The license stands in the name of "A. Lincoln." Make the most of it, my dear sir.

In answer to the gentleman from Texas when he said this town would be flooded with beer joints, we have something worse than beer joints now under the prohibition regime.

Not long ago the Crusaders, a very militant and powerful and able organization, presented a map of Washington, and they put dots where there were speak-easies, and those dots were thickest around this very Capitol. Let us not worry about beer joints. Our present worry is speak-easies. This bill will do much to reduce their number.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] has expired.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mrs. NORTON. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were ayes 131 and noes 65.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventeen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the yeas and nays. Those who favor taking the vote by yeas and nays will stand and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Seventeen Members have arisen; not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused.

So the conference report was agreed to.

On motion by Mrs. NORTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for 15 minutes, that I may speak upon a question I regard of most vital importance to the United States.

I shall address myself to the question of the present seriously depressed price level. Where are we going and where is the price level in this country finally to lodge? Are we finally going to rest ourselves upon the 1914 price level and endure again the conditions such as we had in the 1876-96 period, or are we going to the point where I know this Congress desires that we shall go, the 1926 price level, which will surely revive our national prosperity? I say I know the House of Representatives desires that for the reason that last year upon a measure fathered by our distinguished colleague from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] the House voted, I think 3 to 1, in favor of the 1926 price level.

I have been considerably agitated in the last week or two with things I have been reading in the papers and the trend of business in the United States and I sometimes think, although I do not know, rather I should say I am apprehensive, that we are going to rest the price level upon the basis of 1914. If we do, Mr. Speaker, we are going to be in this depression, in my judgment, for the next 10 years.

What does it mean to deflate this country to the 1914 price level? I have in my hand the statement made by Prof. G. F. Warren, of Cornell University, a statement he made to the National Industrial Conference Board, January 26, 1933, in New York. I shall read just a few paragraphs, but I shall ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD his statement on inflation and deflation.

I quote the following from Professor Warren:

> The price level must be raised to the debt level, or the debt level must be lowered to the price level. This is a matter of grim reality that cannot be cured by psychology, confidence, or Government lending. We must choose between deflation and reflation. No country likes to change its monetary system, nor does any country like to go through wholesale bankruptcies and continue to have millions of unemployed. Our choice is not between two desirable things. It is between two undesirable things. Merely raising the well-known objections to either procedure does not commend the other. The question is, Which is worse? If we wish to go through deflation we may as well proceed with the bankruptcies, foreclosures, and public defaults and get them over with. Merely postponing by lending some money or attempting to hold up the price of this or that thing will accomplish very little.

Professor Warren goes on at some length, but I shall not take the time of the House to read further what he says.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may put Professor Warren's statement in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. Professor Warren's statement continued as follows:

DEFLATION OR REFLATION?

The price level must be raised to the debt level, or the debt level must be lowered to the price level. This is a matter of grim reality that cannot be cured by psychology, confidence, or Government lending.

We must choose between deflation and reflation. No country likes to change its monetary system, nor does any country like to go through wholesale bankruptcies and continue to have millions of unemployed. Our choice is not between two desirable things. It is between two undesirable things. Merely raising the well-known objections to either procedure does not commend the other. The question is, Which is worse?

If we wish to go through with deflation, we may as well proceed with the bankruptcies, foreclosures, and public defaults and get them over with. Merely postponing by lending some money or attempting to hold up the price of this or that thing will accomplish very little.

DEFLATION

If deflation is completed, the following are some of the innumerable adjustments yet to be made:

At the new price levels, public and private debts are nearly equal to the national wealth. These debts will have to be reduced. The only plan thus far proposed for reducing them is bankruptcy and private adjustment. This will probably require 3 or 4 years for the major adjustment and a generation to complete the process. While the more serious part of this is taking place, bankrupt homes, farms, and other properties will always be for sale at less than new costs of construction, regardless of how low these costs may fall. Therefore little building of any kind is to be expected. Consequently most of the basic industries will operate at low capacity and severe unemployment will be continuous. Business cycles in such a period will be suppressed cycles.

The vigorous efforts to reduce taxes will do well if they succeed in making cuts equal to the new taxes necessary to feed the unemployed. Some shifting from real estate to other forms of taxation may occur.

Public debts will increase and some of the Government units will find it impossible to meet their obligations. It will be years before taxpayers get these debts paid.

Adjusting a price level down requires much more time than adjusting it up. It is not difficult to adjust public and private debts to a higher price level, but it is very difficult to reduce them. To adjust debts up merely requires that the usual purchases be made at the new price level with the usual percentage of credit transactions. To adjust debts down means the slow process of bankruptcy. Bankruptcy acts like a house of cards—each bankruptcy starts another.

Bank deposits will decline because of the reduced amount of business and the lower prices at which business is done and the tendency to use cash rather than checks. This latter movement is encouraged by fear of banks, lack of banks, lower interest rates on deposits, charges for checks, taxes on checks, and high postage rates. Many further bank failures will occur.

Because of severe unemployment, some workers are working for extremely low wages, but it is not to be expected that the general wage level will decline to the price level. The long-time tendency is for wages to rise as the output per worker increases. Whenever the debts are liquidated so that business can proceed, wages will be far above pre-war.

Interest rates will be much below pre-war for safe securities, but a large part of the business will be on such a precarious basis that for some years rates for agriculture and industry may be high. Interest payments on bank deposits will be decidedly reduced. It will be impossible for life-insurance companies, universities, hospitals, and other institutions that depend on investments to keep up their incomes. Life-insurance rates will probably rise. The average size of policies will be reduced.

The size of fire-insurance policies will be reduced, losses will be increased, and rates probably will be raised.

Innumerable prices which have not declined will fall. Some of these are freight rates, telephone and telegraph charges, lawyers', doctors', and dentists' fees.

Large numbers of corporations will disappear by bankruptcy or by combination to avoid bankruptcy.

Wholesale writing down of the capital of industrial plants, farms, and city real estate will be necessary.

Costs of distribution will gradually decline so that prices paid to farmers will again come into adjustment with the prices which they pay. Much of this can be done in a half dozen years. Probably it can be completed in a generation.

Some basic commodity prices have fallen too low even for the conditions, and will rise.

Innumerable measures will be tried in attempts to hold up prices of this or that thing. Tariffs, bounties, farm boards, domestic allotments, restrictions on trade between States under sanitary and other guises, pools, gentlemen's agreements, and many others will continue to be tried. Some of these may do a little good, but they will continue to result in disillusion and disappointment. Maintaining the present price of gold means bringing the whole debt and price structure down. To attempt to hold each individual thing up and yet bring down the whole is like sinking a ship but attempting to hold up each rivet and doorknob in it.

Nothing is gained by minimizing the gravity of the situation. Repeated confidence statements cannot change the fact. They discredit leadership and cause losses to innumerable individuals through false hopes. While the country has never before experienced as great deflation as we are now attempting, we have had experiences which indicate the probable length of the deflation disease. It usually takes 6 or 7 years to go far enough with the bankruptcy process so that construction can begin, and it takes many more years fully to complete the process.

If we are going through with deflation, debt-adjustment commissions are desirable to operate for a number of years. The legal system of writing down debts works badly enough when only a few bankrupt properties are thrown on the market. It destroys values for both the creditors and lenders when applied in a wholesale way. A creditor often takes over a home or a farm, keeps it in hopes of a sale until the carrying charges eat up much of the value. In the meantime the property depreciates. Finally, in despair, a shoestring sale is often made to a less desirable buyer than the dispossessed owner. Debt-adjustment commissions should study each case and make recommendations for settlement for all creditors. Such recommendations from a disinterested party would save many owners and help many lenders, and would keep many of the cases out of the courts. Even if moderate reflation occurs, there will be plenty of work for such commissions. If the Government lending agencies wish to lend more money, they will do more good by taking up the safer part of the underlying mortgages in such cases than by direct loans to the lending corporations, which do not get at the root of the trouble.

While it is not the purpose of this discussion to consider what the individual can do for himself, I should like to insert one piece of advice to the millions of farmers and city home owners who are losing their homes and lifetime savings. If one has a good farm, it seems to me that the best thing to do is to retain possession of it as long as possible in the hope that some temporary rise in prices or possibly a monetary change will enable him to keep the property. If he gives up, the savings are surely gone. He has little to lose from holding on as long as any slight chance remains.

The man who has failed in business or is out of work is blamed for it, and he often blames himself. This is adding insult to injury. Most of the failures are not due to unsound business but to unstable money, for which no individual is to blame. The farmer or business man who has failed should not be despondent or commit suicide. He should feel like a man who has just gone through a tornado, stripped of his property but escaped with his life. His family and friends should treat him accordingly.

It is not improbable that the high value of gold will result in discoveries of it, so that a later generation will have inflation.

If the process is carried through, a new generation can be prosperous—except as foolish laws remain to plague it. Any price level is satisfactory after business is adjusted to it.

Can a nation control the price level? I for one believe the United States of America can control the price level, provided we employ the same means England today is using in controlling the price level. [Applause.] But England wants the price level of 1914 and we want the price level that is the honest price level for the payment of our debts. I refer you to the New York Stock Exchange Bulletin for March 1933, volume 4, no. 3. There you will see that England, in terms of her currency, has already arrived at the 1913 price level. I think every Member of this House received a copy of this bulletin. England has won her control of prices and we are still talking of relief measures.

England, for the last five months, has stabilized the price level on the index price of 1913 as 100. This, to me, clearly indicates where the British Government, through the operation of its stabilization fund, is going with reference to the price level it desires. Now, are we going to that price level which, as Professor Warren says, will keep us in this depression for 10 years? We will have to cut down capital structures, we will have to cut down wages, we will have to readjust insurance policies, lawyers' fees, and doctors' fees, and for services in all lines of endeavor.

The nation that controls the market dealings in gold and silver can control the price level. [Applause.] We cannot control it by standing idly by and neglecting the means that other nations employ. England does not control values, Mr. Speaker, through gold alone; they have to control silver as a means for controlling gold, and when they do that, they control the world prices of all that we produce in this country. Our Government must compete with what their Government does to silver, and which they do in order to bring fluctuations in value to gold, and thereby destroy our yardstick for the measurement of our values. For here lies the true cause for the destruction of our commerce and the depression in our values that we now so bitterly complain of. If you want to know where England is going, let me read two or three paragraphs of an article I cut out of the Washington Herald yesterday morning, and you read between the lines. It says, under a London date line:

Gold in the Bank of England's issue due today reached its highest point ever known, at about 175,000,000 pounds, equivalent to about 247,000,000 pounds in the current value of the pound sterling, as a result of the purchase of gold in the open market. The previous gold peak was in September 1928, at 173,900,000 pounds.

Now, I want to read the last paragraph and I would like to have you pay particular attention to it because it bears upon the subject I am talking about:

Authoritative sources refuse to explain the gold policy, but many assume it implies preparation for preliminary stabilization of sterling—

Which means the price level—assuming favorable outcome of the World Economic Conference and war-debt talks with the United States.

In other words, if Great Britain can get concessions on the war debts, or cancel the war debts, she has got the gold now to stabilize the price level on the 1913 basis. If she can get us into an international conference and accept the price level she desires, she knows the United States will be in chaos for 10 years. She knows she can get the products of our farms, mines, and forests below the cost of production, and with our higher costs that must follow from such a conference they can control the markets of the world, and become first in commerce and reestablish her primacy as the world's banker and as dispenser of credits.

I said something a moment ago about the subject of silver. I have said before many times in this House that I am not in any sense interested in the subject of silver as such. I want to repeat again that there is no silver in my State. I have seen a silver mine and I do not know of any friend of mine who has any interest in a silver mine. In order to raise the price level where we desire the price level to be, we must at least counter the acts of the British Government, which they clearly admit are aimed at their control over the value of our property and our products.

Mr. Speaker, I am not against England. I believe these two great English-speaking peoples must stand together. I believe we should be friends. I am not talking in any unfriendly sense, but they do certain things and have done certain things to silver in order to rarefy the value of gold so that they may have control over cotton and wheat and the prime commodities the people of the United States produce and must have a fair price for in order to keep up the value structure in this country. Our position is strictly defensive. There is a just and honest basis for prices. It is that basis where debts are paid in equal values as those in which they are made.

I stated some days ago on this point what Mr. Montague Norman said before the Hilton-Young Commission sitting in London in 1926. I want to read it again in order to impress it upon this House. He was telling how they manipulate silver in order to control the value of gold. I read from the statement of the then governor of the Bank of England:

All those things would react upon this country very seriously. I think that one has also to bear in mind the interaction between gold and silver prices. There is a reaction upon gold prices where an extreme rise or fall takes place in the value of silver, which is none the less serious because it is indirect and not very apparent on the surface. The consequential changes in prices generally and in trade conditions which would be produced, the disturbance to the world's economic peace and confidence, the interference with long-established social habits of the people of India in the use of silver, the shock to the reliance of a great country like China upon silver as a medium of currency and a common store of value could not fail to have important effects upon the gold prices of countries in Europe and, indeed, in America.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, we are vitally interested and much concerned in this question. This question is the depression, and we have it in our power to lift this depression almost immediately. We need only to follow sound monetary procedure, as demonstrated by the action of nations who are actually dealing with this question. Our course is a course of neglect. Our position is a negative position. We are drifting with the currents that other nations set in motion, and we do this in the face of the Constitution and our oath to preserve its mandate on this very matter, where the Constitution provides that Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof.

Congress should take not 15 minutes to discuss this subject, but it ought to take 15 days and go into every ramification and explore every phase of this great subject, because, Mr. Speaker, it means prosperity or it means depression for a number of years to come, in my opinion.

What evidence do we have that European statesmen, generally, know about this proposition? I want to read you a few lines from a statement made by the Honorable A. J. Balfour in the House of Commons, in the year 1896, when England took a procedure to raise the price levels by opening the Bank of India to additional use of silver:

> There is no argument that has brought us into greater discredit or into juster discredit with countries on the continent, with America, and with our own colonies than the creditor-country argument.

What does this mean? It means that where they have credits in foreign countries, if they can extend the unit of measurement—gold—they receive more of the prime commodities that are imported into England than they justly deserve.

Then Mr. Harcourt asked, Why? and Mr. Balfour, answering, said:

> I will tell the right honorable gentleman why. The right honorable gentleman tells us truly enough that the debts of this country are paid in commodities, which are estimated upon a gold basis, and that the results of the appreciation of gold which has gone on during the last 20 years—

And this is what has been going on in the world since 1929—the appreciation of gold—until today it has halved practically all property values, stock values, and bond values in the United States.

Mr. DOUGLASS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FIESINGER. If the gentleman will pardon me just a moment until I get through reading this, I will be pleased to yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is any official business on the program for the remainder of the day?

The SPEAKER. We have the District of Columbia appropriation bill pending.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wanted to get the gentleman more than 10 minutes additional, if the gentleman desired it, or if that were possible.

Mr. FIESINGER. I thank the distinguished gentlemen, Mr. LAMNECK and Mr. BANKHEAD, but I promised the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] I would not ask for more time, but, if I may have 5 minutes more I shall try to finish.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIESINGER. Quoting further from Mr. Balfour—> which has gone on during the last 20 years is that the creditor country thus is paid in commodities, gets a very much larger proportion of commodities, probably twice as many, than on the original gold value of the commodities it had the slightest right to.

In other words, they get twice as much cotton as they are entitled to, they get twice as much wheat and all other prime commodities that we produce in the United States.

> Does the right honorable gentleman think that this creditor argument is one which commends itself to those who have got to pay the debts in this country? What they ask and what we ask is that some standard of debts which would be unchanged over a long period of years should be adopted, not only between individuals but between countries.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DOUGLASS. I wanted to ask what the gentleman regards as the reason for the increased value of gold.

Mr. FIESINGER. That is a very pertinent question and I shall try to answer it. The evidence of the demand for gold throughout the world is the fact that so many countries have depreciated currencies and are unable to pay their obligations. There is a great demand for gold. Gold today is practically in the hands of three nations of the world, the United States, France, and Great Britain. There is a struggle to get gold wherewith to sustain their currencies, because I think every nation in the world has the pride, at least, if not the business judgment, to get gold enough to pay its debts.

Take potatoes for illustration. Let us suppose several nations are selling potatoes and they require gold. They go into the markets of the world, and they undersell each other in order to get gold. When nations are thus strained to sell, they are at the mercy of consuming nations. This lowers the commodity price level throughout the world, and we are in competition in world markets with their products that we produce in surplus and have to meet their prices even though we have 40 or 45 percent of all the gold in the world.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. Is it the gentleman's opinion that our use of silver as an auxiliary to gold in our reserves by the bill which he has introduced, will so affect world prices that we will find ourselves establishing and maintaining the 1926 price level in the United States?

Mr. FIESINGER. In answer to the gentleman I may say that the bill I have offered, H.R. 1577, to this Congress is designed to raise and also control the world commodity-price level, and not for this Nation alone but for the gold-standard nations of the world. This is a defensive measure against the action of those governments that have depressed values in the world. Great Britain has been the chief transgresser for she is known to have done this three times in the last 100 years; she did it recently in 1928–29 when India, being changed from a gold-exchange basis to a gold-bullion basis, suddenly sold on world markets some hundreds of millions of ounces of silver, with results their statesmen and financiers had predicted. What we can control and must control is the buying power of gold. We can control it just as they control it, and more easily than they, because we are on the side of the market easiest to dominate.

The record very clearly shows and the report of our committee so states that England knocks over gold when it is to her interest to do so, and the bill the gentleman speaks about which I have introduced is a counterdefensive to any action that they take to knock gold over and thus tamper with our monetary unit by the use of silver. [Applause.]

A better explanation of the gentleman's question is contained in a letter I recently received from a gentleman whose name is well known in Ohio; in fact, throughout the country, but whose name I am not at liberty to disclose. I quote his letter, as follows:

> MARCH 23, 1933.
> Hon. WILLIAM L. FIESINGER,
> House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.
> MY DEAR MR. FIESINGER: Many thanks for your kindness in sending me a copy of H.R. 1577, together with the extracts from the testimony before your committee given by Mr. Janney. I have read the same with intense interest. In fact, I stayed up until quite some time after midnight reading the RECORD. I have not in the past 2 years read anything which gave me such encouragement. As constituted it is a reasonable and sound solution to the entire problem of our depression. It combines the best features of the program advocated for the remonetization of silver by one group and for the revaluation of the gold ounce by others. At the same time it does not incur the dangers which are inherent in these two proposals as originally brought before the country by their respective advocates. To my mind it strikes directly at the existing corner on gold with the consequent abnormal demand for that commodity by all the nations of the earth. As a result a remedy is offered for improvement in the price level, for a readjustment of credits and debits, a return of our export market, the stimulation of business, and the return of values to a 1926 level.
> I do not presume to be an expert in this particular field, and after most careful reading I can discover for myself no fallacies in the argument or any neglect of the important factors which must be kept in mind in solving the tangled problem of the depression. I am convinced that if your bill passes into law that the United States Government will obtain control of the purchasing power of both silver and gold; and without the need of any international conferences be able to maintain a reasonable ratio between the two. Furthermore, the maintenance of the gold standard eliminates any necessity of modifying present gold-bond contracts. Gold will simply return to its normal purchasing power as of 1926 or approximately thereto.

I am much impressed with the necessity of our Government's avoiding any commitments in respect to the cancelation of debts and in respect to any economic agreements with other countries until this protecting measure has been enacted into law. Time is an essential element in the present emergency, and I trust that your committee will do all in its power to hasten consideration of the bill by Congress.

I do not see why the groups favoring revaluation of the gold ounce as well as the group favoring remonetization of silver should not lay aside their specific programs and lend support to your measure which accomplishes the purpose which they both have in mind whilst avoiding dangers which have been repeatedly pointed out by the opponents of these two measures. Silver must necessarily go up and gold come down and that means restored price levels and a return of prosperity.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object. I think we ought to take up and dispose of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title to the bill, as follows:

H.R. 4589, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For isolating wards for minor contagious diseases at Garfield Memorial Hospital, maintenance, $22,500, or so much thereof as in the opinion of the Commissioners may be necessary.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have before me an editorial from the Florida Times-Union, of Jacksonville, which in part states that the Postmaster General will recommend the return of 2 cents postage on first-class mail due to the failure of the 3 cents postage to bring in more revenue. I sincerely trust this editorial is correct.

In May 1917 the House Ways and Means Committee had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other expenses, and in that bill the Ways and Means Committee had increased postage on first-class mail from 2 to 3 cents.

On page 2754 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 22, 1917, you will find an amendment that I offered to the bill, as follows:

Page 51, line 14, after the figures "1200", strike out all of lines 14, 15, 16, and 17 down to the word "postal"; and on page 51, line 17, after the word "thereof", insert "Provided, The rate of postage on letters of the first class shall be 2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof."

And on page 2755 another amendment, as follows:

Second amendment: Page 51, line 17, after the word "thereof", insert "Provided, That the rate of postage on drop letters of the first class shall be 2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof."

The first amendment was defeated, but the second amendment retaining 2 cents postage on first-class mail on drop letters or letters to be delivered in the city was adopted.

I said at that time if you do not adopt the amendment you will lose in revenue. The merchants in your home where there is a city carrier can get boys to deliver the letters at a price less than 2 cents each, and therefore the merchant will not use the mail and will not pay 3 cents on those letters. They are going to use the cheapest way to deliver the mail, and you will find in the cities they will employ carriers to deliver their mail once a month instead of delivering the same through the post office.

As I say, the second amendment was agreed to and the postage on drop letters remained at 2 cents.

I am sorry the first amendment was not also adopted.

In 1932 the House Ways and Means Committee reported out another revenue bill, and in that bill increased the postage from 2 to 3 cents, with the result that my prophecy of 1917 that there would be a loss in revenue came to pass, and we are now losing on first-class mail and in addition many postal employees have lost their positions and delivery of the mail has been curtailed.

I had this up with the Postmaster General, Mr. Farley; and after going into it carefully, I understand within a few days he will make a report to Congress, and I believe it will be a favorable report.

I therefore urge the Ways and Means Committee to report out a bill again making the rate 2 cents. Mr. Chairman, my remarks of 1917 fully set forth my position on the question of postage and I will not take up any more of the time of the House. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses incident to the enforcement of an act relating to the adulteration of foods and drugs in the District of Columbia approved February 17, 1898 (30 Stat., pp. 246–248), an act to prevent the adulteration of candy in the District of Columbia, approved May 5, 1898 (30 Stat., p. 398), an act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, approved June 30, 1906 (34 Stat., pp. 768–772), and an act to regulate, within the District of Columbia, the sale of milk, cream, and ice cream, and for other purposes, approved February 27, 1925 (43 Stat., pp. 1004–1008), including traveling and other necessary expenses of dairy-farm inspectors; and including not to exceed $100 for special services in detecting adulteration of drugs and foods, including candy and milk, $6,000: Provided, That inspectors of dairy farms may receive an allowance for furnishing privately owned motor vehicles in the performance of official duties at the rate of not to exceed $312 per annum for each inspector.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Page 43, line 15, strike out "$312" and insert in lieu thereof "$480."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment deals with the traveling allowance of milk inspectors for the District of Columbia. There are 5 or 6 of these inspectors. They travel a radius of something like 100 miles about the District of Columbia. They travel every day in the year. They travel over all sorts of roads and in all sorts of weather conditions. It is utterly impossible, as we all well know, for a man to travel those distances over those roads and maintain his automobile and pay for his own gasoline for a dollar a day. The allowance heretofore has been $40 a month. This reduces it to $26 a month. These inspectors have all suffered the reduction which all other Government employees have suffered, but I am sure it is not the purpose of this House to make them travel at less than actual expense.

I know my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is very much interested in the question of milk as a beverage, and I am sure that he does not agree with his friend from New York, Dr. SIROVICH, that milk contains the same chemical content as beer, and I know he does not want to do anything that will prevent Washington from continuing to enjoy the finest and best quality of milk of any city in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman would suggest to these milk inspectors that they buy Ford automobiles like the one that I use on my public business in the city of Washington, a machine that they can get fixed at any country blacksmith shop, I think he will find that they will be able to maintain their machines on the generous allowance granted them in the bill, which is additional to the annual salary of $2,600 they draw.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. In reply to that, the roads that these men travel over are such that they must use either Chevrolets or Fords. I see them constantly.

Mr. BLANTON. The committee carefully considered that matter and determined that they could easily operate on the expense allowance that they are given. Of course, if we are going to send them around in specially built limousines with space enough for their high-top hats, they would have to have more money.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I decline to yield further. The committee determined that thing after careful consideration sitting here in the Capitol in Washington. I happen to have some personal knowledge about it. I own and operate a dairy farm 40 miles from this city, and I know what kind of roads they have to travel over. I operate automobiles over those roads, and I know they cannot do it for a dollar a day. I am sure this committee does not want to do something that is unfair.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, my friend the distinguished gentleman from Virginia is usually correct, but it happens he is not fully informed in this particular instance. I went myself over one of these routes visiting and inspecting dairy farms as far out as Silver Spring. And I am thoroughly familiar with the road conditions referred to and the routine followed by these inspectors. This item was fully considered when the last bill was up here in the House just a few weeks ago, and the House decided that this allowance was ample. The Senate raised the amount, and the conferees took it up in conference and arrived at a figure which we thought would be fair and equitable. The allowance was standardized at an amount which would reimburse every operator of a machine, including these inspectors, and I trust there will be no disposition to interfere with the amount agreed upon by the conferees on the part of the House and the Senate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I imagine that the Members of the House who passed on this matter in the committee have probably had about as much experience in this line of business as has my good friend from Virginia [Mr. SMITH]. If we should leave it to our friend Senator MAGNUS JOHNSON, I am sure that he would claim that he probably knows more about milking cows than any of the rest of us, for we all remember his cow-milking contest here in Washington. Nevertheless, I feel sure that many of us here, from actual experience, know all about milking cows, and all about the dairy business, and all about proper inspection.

When I was a lad, I ran a dairy in connection with regular farm work. I got up at 4 o'clock every morning, shucked the corn, got the fodder down out of the loft, fed all of the livestock, and then milked 12 to 15 cows, hitched up my horses and carried my milk to the city, distributed it there to my customers, then went home for breakfast, and after further attending to my livestock, finally got off to school.

My duties that evening were merely a repetition of the ones performed in the morning. And when not in school I did every kind of farm work imaginable, from plowing, planting, cultivating, and harvesting to cutting wood, digging post holes, and repairing wire fences. I imagine there are others on this committee with like experience. And I did not get $2,600 per year salary and $312 per year expense allowance either, such as these dairy inspectors here in Washington now receive, and respecting which our friend from Virginia seems so afraid that we are not giving them enough. I did that kind of work for quite a long time and received so little for it that I got tired of doing it, and then I did something else.

Mr. KELLER. What did you do?

Mr. BLANTON. I moved back to the city, where lots of impoverished farmers are now moving. I told you yesterday, when I was fighting to keep the million-dollar amendments of my friend from Virginia from being added to this bill, that I would be attacked by the Washington newspapers. True to form, the Washington Herald this morning made its customary 2-column attack upon me. One of the Herald's most prolific able pen pushers, my splendid young friend, Edward T. Folliard, was specially assigned to "dress me up and down." In large box-car-letter headlines he started out with "Representative BLANTON Continues to Think of Washington in Terms of Abilene." Why should I not do that? Are not the people of Abilene just as good and fine as the people of Washington? Are not the people of Abilene just as intelligent as the people of Washington? Are not the people of Abilene entitled to everything to which the people of Washington are entitled?

Then for a subhead, still in very large type, Mr. Editor in Chief Folliard heralded:

> Democrat from Lone Star State is firm in belief that the Federal District should pay all of the small taxes which fall to the lot of citizens in his own home town.

Well! Why not? If the people of Washington paid for all of their own civic expenses themselves and did not call on the people of the United States yearly to contribute millions of dollars to help pay same, then BLANTON might not be so concerned about it. Managing Editor Folliard should explain just why should citizens of Abilene pay all of the taxes necessary to pay the civic expenses of their city and then in addition have to be taxed by the Federal Government to pay millions of dollars every year on the civic expenses of the people here in Washington. It is quite true that I do not want the people of Washington to have any advantage whatever over the people of Abilene.

Then Mr. Big-Town Folliard sideswiped me with this:

> TOM's home town—Abilene, Tex.—has a population of 23,175. Washington has half a million.
> But TOM doesn't see much difference. What's good enough for Abilene, he thinks, ought to be good enough for Washington.

Well, why not? What is good enough for Abilene, is good enough for Washington. I will let Mr. Quintessence Folliard carefully select the 23,175 finest people he can find in Washington, and they will be no finer, no better, no more intelligent, and no more deserving than my 23,175 splendid constituents in Abilene. I will put the business men of Abilene up against the business men of Washington. I will put the Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, and Exchange Clubs of Abilene up against these clubs in Washington. I will put the schools of Abilene—graded, high, colleges, and university—up against the schools of Washington. Why, some of the best teachers in the Washington schools came from Abilene.

Then, Mr. Metropolis Folliard, after wasting nearly two columns in trying to belittle me, with no reference less foolish than the above, gave me this final stab:

> TOM BLANTON enjoys his role as Treasury watchdog. If he sometimes carries it too far, well it must simply be charged up to zeal.
> One of the issues which BLANTON raised was the high cost of congressional funerals—and this against a woman who had, like every congressional widow, buried her husband at Government expense.

He should have been fair enough to state that such issue has been fought out successfully, and that this Congress has reduced the high cost of congressional funerals, and now permits only two Congressmen to attend same at Government expense, while formerly they were sent across the United States in large numbers.

I am wondering why Hearst's Herald permits Mr. Feature Folliard to try to belittle small towns. Why, our great minority leader, BERT SNELL, hails from the small town of Potsdam. Our great Vice President of the United States, Jack Garner, comes from the small town of Uvalde. Our present distinguished Speaker of the House, HENRY RAINEY, is proud of the fact that the little town of Carrollton is his home. Our former distinguished colleague, Uncle Joe Cannon, once ruled as the czar of this House, notwithstanding that the little town of Danville was his home.

My good friend, Mr. Funny Folliard, should post himself. He should go with me sometime to the corner of Fannin and Lamar Streets in the heart of the great city of Houston, Tex., where I was born, and where I lived for a number of years. It is the largest city in the State of Texas, and the National Democratic Convention was held there in 1928. And he should remember that for the past 16 years I have taken a very active part in helping to manage the business affairs of Washington; and then, too, he will remember that for only a very short time has he been identified with Washington business himself.

I know quite a little about the affairs of big cities. I have probably been in as many of them as Folliard. I have spoken in most of the large cities of the United States.

In conclusion let me say to my friend from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] this $312 is nothing in the world but an annual traveling-expense account that we allow to each of these milk inspectors for Washington. This is in addition to their annual salary of $2,600 each of them draws. It does not require a high-salaried man to inspect milk. It requires an experienced man. Yet each of these inspectors is paid $2,600 per annum and is allowed $312 extra for expenses. It takes a high-salaried scientist like Dr. SIROVICH to change the formula of milk, but for proper inspection you do not need doctors. This $312 each was the proper allowance agreed upon not only by the House conferees but the Senate conferees. We are not doing an injustice. I cannot understand why the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] knows so much more about these items than the House committee and the Senate committee. I wonder when he has the time to make a study of all these propositions. He is an earnest, honest, and conscientious legislator. He does hard work on his own committees. It must take most of his time to perform the duty he owes to his own committees.

I do not see how he gets all this extra time to examine the work of other committees as he does. It is just this: He is well known here. Every time you pinch somebody by cutting down an allowance, they run to him. I guess they just worry the life out of him. They say, "SMITH, you have got to get my item put back", and he is so good-natured that he gets up here and fights for them. But some of these allowances and expense accounts are ridiculous. It is getting so that every bureau employee of this Government gets half as much expense allowance as his salary, and we must stop it. We have to cut it down if we are going to keep this Government out of bankruptcy. We have to follow the President's Budget. That is the reason the Congress of the United States has given unusual power to the White House. Congress itself cannot stop these expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For replacement of old mains and divide valves in various locations, on account of inadequate size and bad condition of pipe on account of age, and laying mains in advance of pavements, $50,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN: Page 69, after line 24, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"For additional extension, improvement, and repair of the water-distribution system, including necessary mains, machinery, and equipment, to aid in the relief of unemployment and to be allotted for such projects and purposes and in such amounts as the President may approve (including the allocation of additional sums to any or all of the four immediately preceding items), there is hereby appropriated wholly out of the revenues of the water department such sums (not to exceed in the aggregate $635,000) as may be deemed surplus in such revenues."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose it is necessary for me to say anything particularly about this amendment. This is a companion amendment to the one adopted yesterday, except this relates to the water fund and the other related to the gas fund. It just gives the President the authority, in case of any needed improvements and in case that needed improvement in the water system will relieve unemployment and lessen the burden upon unemployment, to approve any project in the extension of water mains, and utilize this $635,000 for that purpose. It gives a little leeway to take care of any necessary demands.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the services of draftsmen, assistant engineers, levelers, transitmen, rodmen, chainmen, computers, copyists, overseers, and inspectors temporarily required in connection with sewer, water, street, street-cleaning, or road work, or construction and repair of buildings and bridges, or any general or special engineering or construction work authorized by appropriations may be employed exclusively to carry into effect said appropriations when specifically and in writing ordered by the Commissioners, and all such necessary expenditures for the proper execution of said work shall be paid from and equitably charged against the sums appropriated for said work; and the Commissioners in their budget estimates shall report the number of such employees performing such services, and their work, and the sums paid to each, and out of what appropriation: Provided, That the expenditures hereunder shall not exceed $42,000 during the fiscal year 1934: Provided further, That, excluding inspectors in the sewer department and one inspector in the electrical department, no person shall be employed in pursuance of the authority contained in this paragraph for a longer period than 9 months in the aggregate during the fiscal year.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this bill, and the saving of money by the reductions we have made, it will be possible for the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to reduce the tax rate in Washington from $1.70 to $1.50 per hundred on both real property and personal property, and still have plenty of funds out of tax receipts to pay all annual expenses of the District, with a surplus of $3,400,000 left unused.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia already have the power under existing law to make this reduction in the tax rate.

The committee that framed this bill has been criticized for not putting a provision in the bill directing the Commissioners to reduce the tax rate. That would be legislation. The Committee on Appropriations cannot legislate. If those who made the criticism would just think and reflect a moment, they would realize that the committee would never include a directory provision in a bill to any officials who have discretion unless these officials were refusing to do their duty. I am one of those who is assuming that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia will perform their duty which they owe to the people they represent here, and I am assuming that when this bill becomes law the Commissioners themselves will enter an order fixing the tax rate in the District at $1.50, lowering it from $1.70, which they are authorized to do by the law and by the savings we have made in this bill.

It has been intimated that they might not do it. If they should not do it then there will be time enough for Congress to direct them to reduce the tax rate to $1.50 per $100, but I do not believe the Congress will ever have to do that with the present Commissioners. I have perfect confidence in Dr. Reichelderfer, the chairman of the Board of Commissioners, and in the other Commissioners, and believe they will perform their duty. And it is their duty to change the tax rate from $1.70 to $1.50 per $100. As heretofore mentioned, the District then would have a surplus of $3,400,000 left unspent at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I feel I should make a brief statement on this subject. If the amounts contained in this bill are ultimately approved by Congress, at the end of the fiscal year 1934 the general fund of the District of Columbia will have a surplus of $6,000,000. The law requires that a surplus of $3,000,000 be maintained. Even so, it will be $3,000,000 over and above what the law requires as a surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia.

As my colleague has said, the tax rate is $1.70 on the fair full valuation of real estate. In my home State and in yours, when property is assessed for taxation purposes it is assessed at about 50 percent of its fair value and taxes are paid on that amount. Here the property is assessed at full value and the tax rate of $1.70 is paid on the full value. This is an exhorbitant and unreasonable tax on real estate in this District. There are thousands of poor people attempting to buy homes in the District, and for them to be required to pay $3.40 per $100 in taxes on the valuation of these homes according to the way property would be assessed in the other States of the Union is too much.

Let me call attention further to the fact that there is $4,000,000 in delinquent taxes on real estate due the District. On what character of real estate? The little homes poor people are trying to buy and pay for. Wherever possible we should encourage people to buy and pay for homes so they can have a castle of their own. Then they will naturally be proud of their country.

The tax rate in the District of Columbia should be reduced from $1.70 to $1.50 on real estate.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. title II of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, to the extent that it provides for the impoundment of appropriations on account of reductions in compensation of officers and employees, shall not operate to require such impoundment under appropriations contained in this act.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman explain section 7, converting impounding of money in the Treasury?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The 6⅔ percent was taken out before the bill was written. It is not in the bill and you cannot impound money that is not carried in the bill.

Mr. GOSS. So it will not change any existing law, but it applies that law to this bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The Budget eliminated it before it sent the estimates down to the committee.

Mr. GOSS. I understand.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 4589, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, fiscal year 1934, had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

5-DAY WEEK, 6-HOUR DAY

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by incorporating an address delivered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARTLEY] last week over the Columbia network, in connection with the 5-day week, 6-hour day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARTLEY] last week over the Columbia network in connection with the 5-day week, 6-hour day:

The events of the last month have unquestionably inspired renewed confidence and hope for the future throughout the entire Nation. The leadership of President Roosevelt and the cooperation given him by the Congress of the United States has attracted and still holds the admiration of the American people.

The origination of new economies in Government directed toward a balanced Budget, so as to maintain the credit of our Nation, and the enactment of new financial legislation as a step to bring about the rehabilitation of our banking institutions have guided our ship of state through a grave crisis and have directed us on the road to a new era. However, these have been measures of preservation. It now remains for the President and Congress to enact legislation that will aid in bringing about complete recovery. Candor compels the statement that there is little prospect of early recovery unless drastic reforms are invoked to balance production and consumption on a measurably equitable basis.

This can be achieved only when we have adjusted conditions so as to provide jobs for millions of workmen who are idle and who are willing and anxious to work. It is most distressing and, in my opinion, alarming to find that there are now nearly 12,000,000 men and women totally unemployed and many millions who are working only part time, affecting nearly 50 percent of the population of the United States.

Each day adds to the seriousness of the situation, because each day those who had possessed some means and had saved when times were normal have found their savings constantly dissipating and as a result of all that they are becoming dependent.

Employment statistics show that 69 percent of the building-trades workers are totally idle, and from 12 percent to 13 percent are on part time. This situation also exists in varying degrees in other industries such as coal, textile, metal, transportation, and almost every other industry.

This condition has been brought about by two factors. First, the economic crisis, of course, has made a very large contribution toward this alarming situation, but back of it all is the mechanization of industry that has been going on for two decades gradually displacing men and throwing them out of work. Industry has centered its efforts on increasing production through machine refinements and improved methods, based primarily upon labor displacement and a reduction in labor costs, without any regard as to what effect this policy would have on consuming power or public welfare. As an example of the devastating effect on employment due to the advancement of labor-saving devices, I wish to point to its effect in the shoe industry. The time required to make 100 pairs of shoes by the old hand method was approximately 1,800 hours. Today, by our labor-saving-machine methods, the time has been reduced to 106⁹/₁₀ hours, a loss of approximately 1,725 labor hours.

The elimination of manpower by such labor-saving devices has brought about a virtual prostration, until, in fact, conditions are now so serious as to warrant the declaration that an emergency exists that must be met and promptly answered by the entire Nation.

During the depression the total national production loss, variously estimated, has run from 50 to 75 billion dollars, due to the vicious circle of wage cuts, reduced consuming power, maladjustment of labor hours, and widespread unemployment, until the material cost of the pending depression is now much greater than the World War. All have lost. Unemployment has had no beneficiaries.

The moment consuming power departs from its healthy, normal capacity, upward or downward, it is in trouble. Overconsumption plus undercapacity to pay means industrial and financial indigestion. And that is what happened. Why?

Because during the nineteen and twenties the financial power departed from its base lines of consuming and producing power upward into speculative levels, or inflation of credits. Financial power then coaxed industry, which during the war had already greatly overexpanded by means of inflated credits, to still further overexpand plants. Industry then found it had no more people, relatively speaking, to whom to sell, and the people had no more consuming capacity nor capacity to pay than they had before inflation. So what happened? Financial and producing power invented the installment system plus high-power salesmanship, plus intensive advertising, plus every other device calculated to induce people to buy on credit twice or three times as much as they had capacity to consume or to pay for. They were induced to buy two of this and three of that on credit, better homes than they could afford, more and better of everything that they needed or could pay for; and thus economic indigestion was caused in consuming power.

Then the financial power saw the danger and started to be afraid. It began to "become liquid", which means that banks, recognizing a condition of overinflation and overproduction, called in their loans or credits. This action left industry without means to continue to manufacture and to distribute its products. It turned off workers. Everybody grew fearful. Hoarding began. Trade volumes fell. The stock market collapsed. Stocks and bonds lost their earning power—interest and dividends—and people began to unload their securities. Rail loadings fell off, and transportation facilities lost business. More employees were laid off, wages were reduced, and purchasing power was thus further lowered, and so downward we have been spiraling.

It is astounding but nevertheless true, that were it possible by some mysterious power to restore conditions of 1929, when we were at the peak of consumption, when a balance between production and consumption had reached its highest point, that only 55 percent of those entitled to work could be given employment. These conditions must not be permitted to longer continue. To admit this problem cannot be solved in an orderly manner would be an indictment on American common sense. For millions to suffer the lack of adequate food, clothing, and shelter, and be denied work opportunities solely because of increased productive efficiency is to stamp the word "defeat" on our entire social system.

We are, therefore, face to face with the proposition of making adjustments in the working time or prepare to accept an economic condition, which will create and establish a permanent standing army of unemployed. Nothing could be more un-American than a step in the latter direction. Our people do not want charity—they want work. With relief agencies at the breaking point, an attempt to maintain a permanent perpetual army of unemployed is out of the question; but, even were it possible, such a condition would be socially wrong and morally indefensible from any standpoint. This must not happen. We must master the machine and make it serve the public welfare. With the restoration of economic health as our objective, this means that we must stress the right to work as a fundamental right, and in doing so declare that there is no hope for the return and maintenance of prosperity except on a basis of lessened labor hours and high and steadily advancing living standards.

The only remedy for this situation and the surest method to provide employment for our millions of idle will be in the adoption of the 6-hour day, 5-day week bill, as introduced in the House of Representatives by the distinguished chairman of the House Labor Committee, the Honorable WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.

Just what is proposed by this legislation? It would mean no reduction in the hourly wage rate; in fact, wages could and should be put back to the 1929 level. But it would mean that each worker now employed would work one fourth less time and would receive one fourth less income than he did in 1929 until more prosperous conditions returned. It would mean that men now unemployed would have jobs. It would mean that the purchasing power of all our people, at least to the point where the necessities of life could be had, would be restored. It would mean that the wheels of our factories would necessarily begin to turn to supply the demands of this restored consuming class. It would mean much-desired increase in the price of commodities. In short, it would mean a return to better wages and a short cut to normal prosperity; and, in addition, these certain beneficial results would immediately begin to accrue:

First. Stabilization of employment.

Second. Resumption of industry with an immediate improvement in farm prices as the result of increased demand for same.

Third. Stimulation of all lines of production.

Fourth. Ease of strain on financial structure.

Fifth. Rising prices and values of stocks and bonds.

Sixth. Reduction of the strain on charitable organizations.

Seventh. Rising wages as industry recovered.

Eighth. Stabilization of living standards at a point slightly below those of 1929.

Ninth. A greater independence of foreign markets, most of which are gone from us for years to come.

Tenth. Balancing the Budget through increased flow of taxes and repeal of nuisance taxes.

Eleventh. Prevention of an appalling social and financial cost in the future due to social and physical evils now being set up by bitterness, fear, worry, malnutrition, and privation.

The success of this legislation depends on its adoption nationally in every field of work. President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, in a most forceful argument before the Labor Committees of both the House and the Senate, stated that its adoption in the manufacturing industries alone would create jobs for 1,800,000 workers now unemployed. He stated further that if the 30-hour week was adopted in other industry and government, excluding agriculture, 6,500,000 jobs would be created for those now out of work. These estimates are based on analysis of figures that are unassailable.

Action on this problem can no longer be deferred. This is a matter of national necessity if we are to avoid a catastrophe. Since government guarantees the owners of these labor-saving devices their property rights, it is our duty to see to it that the benefits of this progress should be used for all of our people. No one group alone can accomplish it. The situation can only be met by the cooperation of all groups on a national scale. Adjusting the workweek is one of the principles of balance necessary to sustain economic security. No economic order has the right to social sanction that does not take as a cardinal responsibility its stewardship to provide work opportunities for all.

FEDERAL POWER PROJECTS ON THE COLORADO RIVER

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a brief report prepared by the Water Power Commission and the Department of the Interior on the Colorado River, concerning the respective rights of the seven southwestern States of this country. This is a quite important report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter to me from Hon. George Otis Smith, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, concerning the status of all Federal Power Commission projects in the Colorado River Basin, together with the memorandum referred to; and a letter to me from the Honorable E. C. Finney, Solicitor of the Department of the Interior, in relation to water rights on the Colorado River; and also a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Harold L. Ickes, to Mr. M. C. Hinderlider, State engineer for the State of Colorado, pertaining to a proposed contract with the State of Arizona concerning water rights on the Colorado River, as follows:

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION,
Washington, March 24, 1933.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: In pursuance of my promise made at the time of your recent call, I am transmitting herewith for your information a memorandum prepared by the Commission's chief engineer and a member of his staff, containing information about the status of all Federal Power Commission projects in the Colorado River Basin.

Yours very cordially,

GEO. OTIS SMITH, Chairman.

[Memorandum]

COLORADO RIVER BASIN STATUS OF APPLICATIONS

Two applications are now pending before the Commission for water-power projects on the Colorado River below the mouth of Green River. The application of James B. Girand (project no. 121) is for license and that of the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California (project no. 1124) is for preliminary permit. The information about these projects, as given below, has been abstracted from the Commission's files.

PROJECT NO. 121—JAMES B. GIRAND

The application is for a license for development of the Diamond Creek site. The project works would consist of a dam 225 feet high, a power house with installed capacity of 200,000 horsepower, and a reservoir with 130,000 acre-feet of usable storage. (The total capacity of the reservoir is 340,000 acre-feet.) Mr. Girand formerly held a preliminary permit for the project under the terms of which he spent about $60,000 on investigations, foundation borings, and preparation of plans. He started construction in 1925 for the purpose of holding his State water rights, but was stopped by Federal injunction. Several public hearings were held on this case in 1923 and 1925. The Commission on October 28, 1925, adopted resolutions indefinitely suspending action on all applications for projects in the Colorado River Basin, and in the resolutions special mention was made of this application, it appearing that the Commission would give it preferred consideration after termination of the period of suspension. As a result of congressional action, the period of suspension was continued until 1929. In July 1930 the Commission called upon Mr. Girand to show cause why the application should not be rejected because of lack of market to justify construction of the project. After hearing from him the Commission, on March 11, 1931, decided to defer consideration of the case for a period of 2 years, to March 11, 1933. This period expired recently and on March 22, 1933, a letter was directed to Mr. Girand informing him that the Commission now proposes to resume consideration of the case and allowing him until April 30 to file such representations or briefs as he might care to submit regarding disposition of the application.

PROJECT NO. 1124, THE METROPOLITAN WATER DISTRICT OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

This application is for a preliminary permit for a dam at the upper Parker site, about one half mile below the mouth of Williams River, to create a head of 74 feet and a reservoir having usable storage capacity of 686,000 acre-feet. A power house with installed capacity of 136,000 horsepower would be constructed and used to pump water into and through the district's aqueduct, which would take water from the reservoir at a point several miles above the dam. Action on this application was deferred pending completion of the investigation of the Parker-Gila project by the Bureau of Reclamation, as required by sections 11 and 15 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, and also for the purpose of determining the practicability of Government cooperation in the development of the Parker site. In February 1933 the district entered into a contract with the Secretary of the Interior providing for construction of the dam by the Government with funds to be furnished by the district. This contract provides that the United States shall retain title to the dam, have the right to use the upper 10 feet of the reservoir for flood-control purposes, develop and use one half of the available power for irrigation and drainage of lands in Arizona within the Colorado River Indian Reservation and the proposed Gila or Parker-Gila project, and to divert from the reservoir for use on lands in the Colorado River Indian Reservation and other projects such quantities of water as may be consistent with the Colorado River compact and the Boulder Canyon Project Act. Under the contract the district will have the right to develop and use one half of the power available at the dam, and to divert from the reservoir by aqueduct or canal such quantities of water as may be consistent with the Boulder Canyon Project Act, the Colorado River compact, and contracts with the United States dated April 24, 1930, and September 28, 1931, covering delivery of water from the Boulder Canyon Reservoir. In this connection it is interesting to note that the Secretary of the Interior announced on February 13 that a proposed contract between the Federal Government and the State of Arizona was under consideration, under which the United States would undertake to deliver from the Boulder Canyon Reservoir enough water each year for total main-stream uses in Arizona of 2,800,000 acre-feet, leaving the disposition of any water available in excess of that amount, and also questions of priorities, for future determination.

All pending applications on the upper Colorado River and on the Green River and its tributaries are under suspension pending completion by the Bureau of Reclamation of a comprehensive study of the irrigation and power possibilities in the upper basin, and more definite allocation of waters by agreement between the upper States. This suspension has been made at the special request of the governors of the upper States, the following applications being involved:

Project no. 158, Utah Power & Light Co.: At Rattlesnake Canyon on Green River, Utah.

Project no. 165, Utah Power & Light Co.: At Flaming Gorge on Green River, Utah and Wyo.

Project no. 279, Utah Power & Light Co.: On Green and Yampa Rivers, Utah and Colo.

Project no. 301, Clare N. Stannard: At Kremmling site on Colorado River, Colo.

Project no. 524, Humphreys, Ratliff & Ratliff: At Split Mountain Canyon on Green River, Utah.

All remaining projects in the upper basin are on minor tributaries, and their status is as follows:

Project no. 190, Uintah Power & Light Co.: License issued August 7, 1931, for a small constructed project on the Uintah River and Pole Creek, Utah. There is no storage.

Project no. 733, Western Colorado Power Co.: License issued April 13, 1931, for the Ouray plant on Uncompahgre River, Colo. The plant is constructed and there is no storage.

Project no. 997, Eagle River Electric Co.: License issued August 7, 1930, for a small run-of-river plant on Gypsum Creek, a tributary of Eagle River, Colo.

Project no. 1014, A. J. Allen: License issued June 12, 1930, for a small run-of-river plant on East Brush Creek, a branch of Eagle River, Colo.

Project no. 400, Western Colorado Power Co.: This project includes the Ames and Ilium plants on Lake Fork of San Miguel River and the Tacoma plant on Animas River, Colo., all of which have been constructed and in operation for many years. Issuance of the license has been delayed pending agreement on valuation.

Projects nos. 842 and 857, R. D. Webb: Preliminary permits have been issued to Mr. Webb for these two projects, No. 842 on Lake Fork of Gunnison River, and No. 857 on Henson Creek. These projects would involve a moderate amount of storage. The permits have been made subject to special conditions approved by the Bureau of Reclamation to safeguard the water supply of the Uncompahgre irrigation project.

All licenses and permits contain a clause approved by authorized representatives of the upper-basin States, limiting water rights to the requirements of the Colorado River compact and the Boulder Canyon Project Act.

Action on project no. 854, Humphreys, Ratliff, and Ratliff, on Brush Creek, a branch of Green River, Utah, has been suspended at the request of the applicant and also to await completion of the investigation being made by the Bureau of Reclamation.

The only application remaining on Little Colorado River is that of United Verde Copper Co. for a preliminary permit for project no. 1003. Consideration of the application was suspended temporarily because of the relation of the project to the larger Colorado River problems and to allow time for the applicant to develop a market for the power. Similar action has been taken on project no. 767, on Williams River, for which the application of Joseph Wittmann for preliminary permit is pending.

On Gila River and its tributaries one very small run-of-river project has been licensed, project no. 989, Beaver Creek Ranch, on Beaver Creek, a branch of Verde River; and 11 applications for permit or license are now pending. Two of these are on the main stream—no. 837, Arizona Edison Co., near Clifton, Ariz., and no. 1164, Will W. Chadwick, on the upper Gila River, in New Mexico. The Commission has recently received notice of withdrawal from the receivers of the Arizona Edison Co., and the Chadwick application has been suspended pending adjudication of water rights on the upper Gila. Four applicants, nos. 954, 967, and 968, by James B. Girand, and no. 425, by John L. Fish, remain on Salt River. A considerable amount of storage would be developed by these projects, but since they are all above the almost complete regulation available at Roosevelt Reservoir, it does not appear that their construction will affect the flow of the Gila River or any interstate water rights. Action on all of these applications has been postponed from time to time for various reasons. The other five applications are as follows:

Project no. 741, Joseph Wittmann: The application is for a preliminary permit for a project on a small tributary of the Santa Cruz River.

Project no. 1062, Arizona Water Conservation District: The application is for a preliminary permit for a project on Hassayampa River.

Project no. 1090, Charles H. Rutherford: The application is for a preliminary permit for a project on West Clear Creek, a tributary of Verde River.

Project no. 1091, Ralph Murphy: The application is for a preliminary permit for a project on West Clear Creek.

Project no. 1092, Ralph Murphy: The application is for a preliminary permit for a project on Wet Beaver Creek, a tributary of Verde River.

Preliminary permits may be issued for one or more of these five projects. Although some storage is involved, these projects, if constructed, would have but little effect on the flow of Gila River.

ROGER B. MCWHORTER,
Chief Engineer.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, March 18, 1933.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. TAYLOR: In reply to your oral request of this morning for information regarding the proposed agreement with the State of Arizona as to water from the Colorado River, I enclose for your information a copy of a letter written by the Secretary of the Interior to Mr. Hinderlider, Denver, in which the Secretary states that he does not propose to proceed further with the matter at this time.

The proposed contract contained the following clause:

"This contract is without prejudice to the claims of the State of Arizona and States in the Upper Basin as to their respective rights in and to waters of the Colorado River, and relates only to water physically available for delivery in the lower basin under the terms hereof."

It also contains a provision that the agreement is subject to the Colorado River compact.

Very truly yours,

E. C. FINNEY, Solicitor.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 15, 1933.

Mr. M. C. HINDERLIDER,
State of Colorado Engineering Department,
Denver, Colo.

MY DEAR MR. HINDERLIDER: I have received your letter of the 7th and on inquiry I find that the former Secretary of the Interior, on February 7, 1933, promulgated regulations governing the delivery of water in Arizona from the Colorado River. He drafted and signed a proposed form of contract with the State of Arizona providing for the delivery annually from the Boulder Canyon project of 2,800,000 acre-feet of water, or so much as may be necessary to enable a total use in that quantity from the main stream and its tributaries other than the Gila. It is my understanding that this contract was presented to the Governor of Arizona by a representative of the former Secretary of the Interior but that no action has been taken toward its acceptance by the State of Arizona. I do not propose to proceed further with the negotiations at this time.

Very truly yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES.

REFINANCING OF FARM MORTGAGES

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein two brief resolutions pertaining to the refinancing of farm mortgages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following brief resolutions pertaining to the refinancing of farm mortgages:

RESOLUTIONS TO CONGRESS

To the Honorable OTHA WEARIN:

The Guthrie County Taxpayers' League respectfully requests you to support the following legislation:

That Congress issue no more tax-free nor interest-bearing bonds.

That Congress repeal the Federal Reserve Act and liquidate the charters of the Federal Reserve banks.

That Congress function as it should and make and issue its own currency.

That the Frazier bill with this clause included, that the Government refinance loan-company bonds at market value or cash value instead of face value, be enacted.

That Congress rapidly inflate the buying power of the American dollar and rapidly increase the volume of currency.

That Congress remonetize silver and give us a dollar cheap enough that other countries can trade with us and buy our products.

RACHEL REVELL, President
(Representing 3,000 members).

GUTHRIE CENTER, Iowa.

BEDFORD, IOWA, January 14, 1933.

At the annual meeting of the Bedford National Farm Loan Association, composed of 96 members and representing loans of more than $700,000, the following resolution was adopted and a copy ordered sent to our Congressman, Mr. OTHA D. WEARIN:

"Whereas the conditions of many of the members of this association, together with other hundreds in Taylor County, have become almost unbearable, in many instances the returns from the entire crop not being sufficient to meet interest and taxes: Therefore

"We respectfully request and urge the Congressman, Mr. WEARIN, to use his influence and vote in securing such legislation as will refinance the loans of the various land banks operating under the laws of the United States, so that the mortgagor may have a longer time to mature his loan and at a lower rate of interest."

J. U. WYANT,
J. H. OSBORN,
R. E. TAYLOR,
Committee.

Addressed to OTHA D. WEARIN.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 58 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, April 6, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

LOANS TO BANKS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram I have just received from Hon. A. Harry Moore, Governor of the State of New Jersey, in which he protests vigorously against the further publication of Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JERSEY CITY, N.J., April 5, 1933.

HON. WARREN W. BARBOUR,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

The last publications of Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans to banks did incalculable harm. To continue these publications will mean further runs on banks and ruin to many. Again I vehemently repeat my protest as Governor of New Jersey to the publication of names of banks. Such publication can serve no good purpose and only serves to undo the good work which the President has accomplished in restoring confidence. Senator ROBINSON deserves support and cooperation in his effort to remedy this situation.

A. HARRY MOORE,
Governor of New Jersey.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed and to lie on the table an amendment I propose to offer in behalf of the Committee on Banking and Currency to the bill (S. 1110) to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to refinance farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, to amend and supplement the Federal Farm Loan Act, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes, when that bill shall be under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H.R. 4589) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States, submitting a nomination, was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show the following telegram from the secretary of the Michigan Farm Bureau:

> Black bill would seriously cripple beet manufacturing and canning operations, which would immediately be reflected in price and marketing opportunities for farm products. Beet factories holding up plans until outcome of bill is known.
> C. L. BRODY,
> Secretary Michigan Farm Bureau.

I want the RECORD also to show that it is the opinion of the Senate—and any Senator will correct me if he disagrees—that the Dill amendment, adopted as shown at page 1198 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, fully covers and exempts sugar beets as perishable vegetables within the language of that amendment and that that is the intention of the Senate in connection with this language. No denial being entered by any Senator, I take it we may consider it settled that the processing of sugar beets into beet sugar is exempt from the operations of this bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk a letter from the National Dairy Union in connection with the pending unfinished business.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table, and it was read, as follows:

> WASHINGTON, D.C., April 6, 1933.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: Creameries, cheese factories, and egg-processing plants must operate at least 6 days in the week, most of them 7 days, and must care for all of the product offered them.
> Milk-handling plants must operate 7 days in the week.
>
> All of the products handled are perishable and must be processed the same day as received.
>
> These plants afford a cash market for every pound of butterfat, every gallon of milk, and every dozen eggs offered them by the farmers, the best cash market the farmer now has.
> If the 30-hour week bill is applied to these plants it will without doubt more than double the cost of operation, and without doubt most of this added cost of operation, since it cannot under present conditions be passed on to the consumer, must be reflected back and taken out of the prices which the farmers receive.
>
> There has been approximately no falling off in employment and no workers discharged in the processing plants of the dairy industry. We are employing as many men now as, perhaps more than, we employed in 1928 or 1929.
>
> A creamery-plant operation is an 8- or 9-hour operation. Two shifts of 6 hours each cannot be operated in the ordinary plant.
> Under these conditions we wish you to exempt plants manufacturing or processing dairy or poultry products of a perishable character from the provisions of the Black bill. They should be included in the list of exceptions already in the Dill amendment. We believe this should be proposed as an amendment to the Dill amendment. The owners, operators, and managers of more than 3,500 creameries and 1,500 cheese factories, more than half of which are farmer-owned cooperatives, will unite in this request.
> Yours respectfully,
>
> THE NATIONAL DAIRY UNION,
> A. M. LOOMIS, Secretary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to have read from the desk a short telegram along the same lines as the letter which has just been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I send the telegram to the desk and ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 6, 1933.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D.C.:

Urge that you use influence to exempt milk and its products from Senator BLACK's bill, S. 158. The employment provisions as now contained in said bill would seriously injure milk producers and distributors in Memphis territory.

J. C. DAVIS,
President Shelby County Milk Producers Association.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, an effort to relieve the serious condition due to unemployment, regardless of the particular form that it may take, attracts the attention and sympathy of people everywhere. It can hardly be expected that the person who now holds a full-time job is particularly interested in spreading the work so as to reduce his hours of labor in order that some other person may be given at least a part-time job. Others, however, who are not influenced by personal considerations, realize that spread of work is the important thing to accomplish; important to go as far with it as it is reasonably possible.

Two years ago, in an address I made in Massachusetts, I stated that in my judgment—

> Some way must be found to more equitably distribute the work at hand. Less hours of work for each day or for each week is the only answer I know. I am not certain that this cannot be done without reducing the total wage for each person. I am not certain that this is not an effective way of getting a more equitable distribution which I think is so necessary. It, of course, cannot be done in all instances, but it can be done in many. Shorter hours would give more time for recreation and improvement in education. It ought to increase the standard of American citizenship.

I believed then, as I believe now, that the struggle with unemployment is to be a permanent one in this country and that it will be a matter for serious consideration always by legislators as well as by those who control the various industries of the Nation. I, therefore, approach this subject of reducing the hours of labor with a great deal of sympathy.

The proposed method, however, contained in the bill now before the Senate, from my point of view, is to be approached with a great deal of alarm. I do not see how any person, whether he be lawyer or layman, who reads the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Child Labor Law case can possibly reach any other conclusion than that this particular proposed law is unconstitutional. It may be said, therefore, that those of us who believe that it will be declared unconstitutional have no occasion to be alarmed about its provisions or about the effect it will have upon the industries of the Nation.

The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has stated that, because in the Child Labor case the decision of the Supreme Court was by a 5-to-4 vote, he is willing to support this bill in order that a further test may be made before that Court, which, at the present time, is somewhat different in personnel. I have some sympathy for the legislator who undertakes to determine by a study of the Supreme Court decisions whether a proposed law is constitutional, when he finds a decision in point was made by a majority of one. I have never, however, been able to get very much satisfaction out of minority opinions of any court. The majority opinions of the Supreme Court are absolutely controlling in all other Federal court jurisdictions. The minority opinions are interesting always but are never controlling. I do not see how a legislator can ignore such opinions any more than a district or circuit court judge may ignore them.

We ought to remember that an act passed by Congress and approved by the President, although adopted in direct conflict with the opinions of the Supreme Court, is nevertheless the law of the land until the Supreme Court has decided that it is unconstitutional. So if this bill should be passed and approved by the President, every person who fails to comply with its terms will be subject to fine and imprisonment until the act is determined to be unconstitutional.

This proposed act is to take effect 30 days after its approval, and the entire group, including all of the operators of mines, quarries, mills, canneries, workshops, factories, or manufacturing establishments in the United States will be compelled immediately to comply with its terms. It will be the duty of railroad corporations, it will be the duty of those who are hauling goods in interstate commerce by means of trucks to be certain to see to it that the manufacturer of such goods has complied with the law.

There will immediately arise a dispute with organized labor about a reduction in the amount of the weekly wage. The author of the bill frankly admits that he does not contemplate that the employee will have his wages reduced at all. While the bill does not go so far as that, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] states that he is expecting organized labor, together with public opinion, to compel the employer to pay a wage equal to that which he is now paying for longer hours of service. So the idea of passing a law, believed by many who have indicated that they propose to vote for it, to be unconstitutional, is not a thing to be lightly considered, because, in addition thus to violating our oath of office, we will have caused a disturbance between industry and labor that have struggled so valiantly for the last 2 or 3 years to live together in peace and harmony.

The author of the bill, in referring to the case of Hammer v. Dagenhart (243 U.S. 251), which is the familiar decision relative to the child labor law, frankly stated that he disagrees with the majority opinion in that case, but does agree with the minority opinion written by Mr. Justice Holmes. In several places in his argument the Senator from Alabama stated that he expected to show that this proposed legislation was constitutional under that majority opinion. He was not explicit, however, and, indeed, offered no explanation of his statements that this bill would come within that majority opinion. One derived the distinct impression from his argument, however, that he was resting his statement solely upon the ground that the decision was a so-called "5-4 decision"; that the personnel of the Court had since that time changed; that, in addition, there was a change in the economic conditions, and that the combination might in some fashion induce the Court to overrule that decision. To my mind he was holding out for himself and to others who may be interested in this legislation an absolutely false hope. That contention was based upon a principle too well established by the Supreme Court to be overruled at the present time or any future time.

I desire to quote from the majority opinion in the Child Labor case briefly as follows:

> We have neither authority nor disposition to question the motives of Congress in enacting this legislation. The purposes intended must be attained consistently with constitutional limitations and not by an invasion of the powers of the States. This court has no more important function than that which devolves upon it the obligation to preserve inviolate the constitutional limitations upon the exercise of authority, Federal and State, to the end that each may continue to discharge, harmoniously with the other, the duties entrusted to it by the Constitution.
> In our view the necessary effect of this act is, by means of a prohibition against the movement in interstate commerce of ordinary commercial commodities, to regulate the hours of labor of children in factories and mines within the States, a purely State authority. Thus the act in a twofold sense is repugnant to the Constitution. It not only transcends the authority delegated to the Congress over commerce but also exerts a power as to a purely local matter to which the Federal authority does not extend. The far-reaching result of upholding the act cannot be more plainly indicated than by pointing out that if Congress can thus regulate matters entrusted to local authority by prohibition of the movement of commodities in interstate commerce, all freedom of commerce will be at an end, and the power of the States over local matters may be eliminated, and thus our system of government be practically destroyed.

Mr. President, that opinion was at the October term of the Court in 1917. Five years later, in the October term, 1922, in the case of Adkins against the Children's Hospital, which involved the question of the wages for women in the District of Columbia, the Court said:

> Enough has been said to show that the authority to fix hours of labor cannot be exercised except in respect of those occupations where work of long-continued duration is detrimental to health. This Court has been careful in every case where the question has been raised to place its decision upon this limited authority of the legislature to regulate hours of labor and to disclaim any purpose to uphold the legislation as fixing wages, thus recognizing an essential difference between the two. It seems plain that these decisions afford no real support for any form of law establishing minimum wages.

In my judgment, it would be an unfortunate thing for this country if the minority opinion in that case should ever become the law of the land. Mr. Justice Holmes based his opinion broadly upon the ground that the Congress was given the specific authority to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. He contended that, given the power to regulate, it necessarily carried with it the power to prohibit. The authority therefore rested solely in the Congress to do what it pleased with respect to interstate commerce.

This is the language used by Mr. Justice Holmes in that case:

The statute confines itself to prohibiting the carriage of certain goods in interstate or foreign commerce. Congress is given power to regulate such commerce in unqualified terms. It would not be argued today that the power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit. Regulation means the prohibition of something, and when interstate commerce is the matter to be regulated I cannot doubt that the regulation may prohibit any part of such commerce that Congress sees fit to forbid.

If that be true, the Congress could do what is sought to be done here, namely, to regulate the hours of labor in the production of articles that enter interstate or foreign commerce. If that be true, it could undoubtedly fix a minimum and maximum wage that should be paid by the employer in the production of articles that were to be transported from one State to another. If that be true, it would necessarily follow that the Congress could fix the price of the article that should be transported in interstate commerce. We would, therefore, have left to the Congress the right to prohibit the hours of labor, fix the price for labor, and fix the price of the article to be transported. Indeed, under this theory the Federal Government might very well require a license from every manufacturing concern in every State that desired to transport articles produced in interstate commerce.

I have not any doubt that there are many persons in and out of Congress who believe that this is a proper function of the Congress, and that if the Congress finds it desirable to do these things it ought not to be limited by the Constitution; that certainly it ought not to be so limited by a 5 to 4 decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I think the present condition of the country, the temper of the people of the country, and the reflection of that temper in the Congress, show that but for the prohibitions in the Constitution we would right now be enacting legislation that would probably bring to us greater distress than we have ever experienced before. When the people of the Nation cannot solve their own difficulties, when they are plunged into an economic depression, when millions of people are out of employment, the most natural thing for them to do is to turn to the people who make the laws that govern their conduct. There is great confusion among the individuals and among the classes and groups of individuals, each making suggestions that they believe will be helpful. These are passed on to the Congress, and there is confusion here also. Every man of us is anxious to do what he can for the good of his country as a whole; but, at the same time, each of us has closest to his heart the interests of the people of his own State. That which is helpful to one is harmful to another, and thus we go from day to day, trying to find a solution of the problems that confront the Nation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Delaware has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have 30 minutes on the bill, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has 30 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. But it seems to me that it is exceedingly fortunate that always there stands out boldly one great fundamental law which we cannot change in a moment, in a day, in a week, or in a year, namely, the Federal Constitution. That which we would adopt today, if it were not for the Constitution, we would not think of adopting after the excitement of the time had passed and sober second thought had fully asserted itself.

It must be remembered that there is some limitation upon the police powers of a State. The Oregon case in which the Supreme Court held that a law prohibiting employees from working more than a certain number of hours in industries of that State was approved solely upon the finding of the Supreme Court of Oregon that it was done to preserve the health of the workers of that industry. Upon no other ground could they find it within the terms of the Constitution.

On the other hand, in the case of Adkins v. Children's Hospital (261 U.S. 525), which involved a law fixing a minimum wage for women in the District of Columbia, the Supreme Court distinctly held that while it had approved all laws that were passed by the States for the protection of the health of individuals, that law could not be upheld upon any such ground. The Court distinctly stated in that case that the fixing of wages could not be justified on the ground that it had anything to do with the health of the individual. It is true that in that case there were dissenting opinions also, but does anybody believe that the Supreme Court would reverse that decision if we should now pass a law fixing a minimum wage for women working in the different industries of the District of Columbia?

If this law is passed upon the theory of the dissenting opinion in the Child Labor case and upon the theory that the Congress, having the right to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, has the absolute right to do what it pleases with respect to commodities entering interstate commerce, is there any reason why the Congress should not pass an act fixing a minimum price on all farm products entering interstate commerce? If it be an absolute right which the Congress has, what could the answer be if the Congress should pass a bill providing that wheat, as an illustration, should not be transported in interstate commerce unless there be a certificate showing that the purchaser paid at the border line at least $1 per bushel for the wheat? If this be an absolute right, and it be true that cotton is being sold at too low a price, and it is desirable to raise the price of it in order that the purchasing power of the cotton growers may be increased, why should we not fix a price on cotton to make certain that those persons who want to buy it and cannot get it out of the State in which it is raised without its entering into interstate commerce shall be compelled to pay a certain fixed price for the cotton? This would relieve our entire difficulties with the price of farm products. The only embarrassing thing that the farmer would then have would be the products that he sold in his own State.

Mr. President, if we were able to do that, we would at the same time be able to limit the amount that the farmer could ship in interstate commerce; and therefore we could control the production of the wheat, cotton, or any other farm product that we cared to include in the measure.

If the dissenting opinion in the Child Labor case is to be followed, and there is no restriction upon what the Congress can do, then it is just as legal to do what I have suggested as it is for the Supreme Court to approve the provisions of this particular bill.

But, Mr. President, there are other difficulties beside the constitutional difficulties. We cannot fix the hours for men to work in the various industries mentioned in this bill without causing great confusion and doing a great injustice to many business concerns of the country. It is perfectly possible that the problem could be worked out in many instances without great harm to the industry; but, in my judgment, in most instances it would be to the great disadvantage of the employee.

It is all very well to talk about the great profits coming to the industrial concerns of the Nation; it is all very well to talk about the great injustice that has been practiced upon the employees in many of these industries; it is all very well to call attention to the fact that labor has been forced to fight for the many concessions that have been made to it; but, after all is said and done, the operation of all these industries is a voluntary thing. The investment in the first place is made with the hope that a substantial return will be made upon the investment. The investment carries with it the risk of losing the whole of it. That means, of course, that the investor expects to get more than a normal return. If labor, by force or otherwise, puts the industries in such a position that the chances of a sufficient return on their investment is not present, the investment will not be made, and consequently there will be no employment for labor in that prospective operation. If, therefore, by legislation or otherwise, we impose upon industry a burden which it cannot reasonably bear, we have done no service to labor, no service to the prospective investor, and no service to the country.

Now, Mr. President, addressing myself to the particular amendment that is pending, I desire to call attention to a publication by the Bureau of Labor Statistics on the Trend of Employment, and to call attention to the fact that in table 2 there is given a list of 73 industries and the hours of labor worked in those industries during the month of January 1933. The table shows that in those 73 industries the average number of hours per week for each worker was 35.9. So that if the object of this bill be to increase the employment of the Nation, then the adoption of this particular amendment increasing the weekly hours from 30 to 36, regardless of whatever else may be said about the bill, cannot accomplish that object if these figures be correct; and I assume that they are correct.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I desire, however, to call his attention to the fact that those tables which I have show the average hours per week worked. There are a great many employees who are working vastly longer hours than the average. In addition to that fact, there is a limitation in this bill of the hours per day; and to reach the average of 35 hours per week the figures which I have, and which have appeared in the RECORD, show that they are working 8, 9, and all the way up to 16 hours per day.

Were there not a limitation in this bill of the hours per day, insofar as the average is concerned the Senator's argument would be applicable; but the Senator can readily distinguish the difference, in the first place, between the average hours worked when a great many are working more than that average per week, and, secondly, the vastly more important difference is that there is a limitation here on the hours per day; and the 35 hours may have been worked in 2 days or 3 days, which would be far more than the average daily work provided in this bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not quite certain that I understand the contention of the Senator; but, of course, it may be said that we may pick out of these industries various longer hours. For instance, here is the baking industry, where the hours were 46.4 in January 1933. Now, of course, if that were limited to 30 hours, something would be saved, I admit. I am only calling attention to the publication, however, and calling attention to the fact that out of 73 industries at the present time the average is 35.9 hours per week. Whatever explanation Senators may care to make with respect to it, I submit that it is of some importance in this argument.

I desire, in answer to a further suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama in his argument as to the share-the-work movement, to say that the chairman of the national committee of the share-the-work movement reported on January 1, 1933, that more than 5,000 corporations and firms had adopted the work-sharing principle in some form, and that at the beginning of 1933 there were on the pay rolls of these enterprises more than 3,500,000 persons who would have been idle but for the application of plans for spreading the work. My recollection is that that effort began some time in August of last year, and I think that it has accomplished a great deal.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer; but I cannot understand how those of us here who have the very high regard which we all have for State rights, and have in mind the importance of guarding those rights with great jealousy, can for a moment be anxious to force upon the Nation, through an opinion of the Supreme Court, the absolute right of the Federal Government to control all things produced in a particular State.

To my mind, while nothing is more important, perhaps, than to get these unemployed people a job, I conceive that it would be of the greatest distress to the Nation if this bill should pass and if the Supreme Court should reverse itself and hold to the opinion that the Congress has the right to do whatever it pleases with respect to interstate commerce, thus depriving the States of those principles to which they have clung so tenaciously ever since the foundation of the Republic.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and also against the bill. I would as soon give the Congress the power to fix the hours of labor at 1 hour per week as 70.

While the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas may seem to modify or ameliorate the monstrous evil of the bill, the whole proposition is so abhorrent to sound economics and to the character of our Republic that notwithstanding I have received numerous telegrams and importunate demands to offer amendments, I have been and shall be content to vote against the entire proposition, in whatever form it may be presented. I shall proceed very briefly to give my reasons.

The bill would deprive the several States of the power which they have enjoyed from the foundation of the Republic to this hour, to govern and to attend to and to regulate their domestic affairs and their industries and the hours of labor in industry, and, in fact, those things which are essential in the life and the civilization of the States.

We have had a strange course here lately. The States first became borrowers from the Federal Government. More recently they became beggars from the Federal Government, and now it is proposed to destroy the last vestige of their self-respect, deprive them of their rights and their powers, and, under every implication of this measure, erect here in the name of our Republic a centralized socialism that would negative, as I conceive it, every particle of the character of the Union itself, and inevitably would predicate that communism which we all profess to abhor, but which we all continually seem to court.

I had been hoping that the American Nation, notwithstanding its desperation, would be content for the unfortunate nations on the Continent of Europe, and even reaching over into Asia, to perform their experiments with socialism and with communism, that we might stand off from afar and, in the security of 140 years of glorious and successful national life, mark the vicissitudes of their experiments. But the pending bill proposes that we shall follow in the fateful train of the nations across the sea, from not one of which have I heard and from not one of which have I seen one word of light tending to give us comfort or guidance.

I register here, as a Senator from the State of North Carolina, a solemn protest against the proposed destruction of her fundamental rights and functions. I still conceive of that Commonwealth as a commonwealth. I know she is a dutiful and loyal member of this Union, that she is an integral part of this structure we call the American Republic, but I know also that she was a State before there was a Union. Down in my heart, while I hope the Union may last—and I avoid any idea of rhetoric here about the Union and the Republic—while I hope the Republic may last, I do hope and I do pray that, whether the Republic lasts or the Union lasts, the Commonwealth of North Carolina will last, and I think it important to the permanency of her institutions that I, as one of her Senators, shall register this protest.

I consider this bill as a denial of the liberties, and the essential liberty for the preservation of which this Union was created, the right of personal liberty. I wish I had time to go into an exposition of that. We use the word "liberty" in the preamble to the Constitution without realizing that it sums up within just a few letters all the historical liberties of the English-speaking race; and we come here with one bill which proposes to tell the employer how long he shall employ a man and proposes to tell the worker how long he shall work.

It is precisely that negation of liberty that lays the foundation of the order in Europe, and, if I may with propriety say so, particularly the order under the Italian dictator and the tyrant who rules over Russia. We make our progress in that socialism only by way of despoiling everything that America ever meant; and the Republic ceases to have its meaning and the Union ceases to be the Republic which our fathers handed down to us whenever we attack, whenever we impair the liberties which our fathers gave to us for an inheritance.

Mr. President, I rejoiced when on yesterday the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] struck down with one blow the absurd—I will not trespass to go further—the absurd argument of "emergency." I did not think I would ever live to hear anybody say that the oath of my office here, to maintain true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, the only oath that I take, was one I might vary with the winds. But this bill was projected upon that theory of emergency, and when that went down the whole thing went down, and the bill would have to be rewritten. It is predicated upon emergency; yet that is gone.

Having said that, I wish to say one word about a constitutional feature which has not been mentioned. The courts are clear, the decisions are here and are in the RECORD, and an affirmative vote for this bill can mean but one thing; that is, that the man who votes for it wishes to raise a presumption of constitutionality of a bill or a measure the whole principle of which has been declared unconstitutional.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish my sentence. I abhor that presumption. I do not know to what lengths I would go to repudiate and denounce and condemn that presumption. If I had no other reason for voting against this bill, I would vote against it in order that at least I might have registered my will that this presumption shall under no circumstances be raised. We know that if the bill becomes law, it then will go to the Court with the presumption of validity and of constitutionality.

Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. The able Senator is no doubt familiar with the jurisprudence that prevents a commodity being transported in interstate commerce if a railroad has any interest in its manufacture. That was not decided by a divided court opinion, as I remember.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. LONG. Also the monopoly statute, which prevents even a Bible, as the Senator from Alabama has suggested, being transported if it has been manufactured by a monopoly. Those would certainly give the Senator all the necessary constitutional authority for what might be held in the Dagenhart case.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have seen the gymnast perform in the top of the tent, sometimes on the floor of the Senate, but I have never yet seen one who could make successfully the leap from the right to regulate the articles which may be shipped in interstate commerce to the right to fix the wages or the hours of a man who is working on an article which may be shipped. Others may be capable of that, but I was never practiced in legislative gymnastics, and I am afraid it is too late at least for me to learn.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is a good deal of surface inconsistency, it seems to me, in the decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon interstate commerce. There may be a thread of consistency that runs through all of them.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator let me ask that this time be not taken out of my time, because I should like to have my full time?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will not ask the Senator the question.

Mr. BAILEY. Go right ahead. I should like very much to have the Senator propound his question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I had forgotten that the time was limited.

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps the Chair can take the time out of the time of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. He could not take it out of my time.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the Senator from Kentucky is to speak on the bill, and I assure him I do not think there is anything I could contribute by way of light to his thinking on this subject.

I wish to go into the economic principle involved. I assert that the effect of the bill would be, not to increase employment, but to increase unemployment; and I want to be heard about that.

Mr. President, the basis of employment of labor in any place on earth is this: The number of men employed is always in direct ratio to the amount of capital invested, and invested in productive enterprise, and just so long as the Congress of the United States continues to hold over capital—and by capital I do not mean money furnished by men of very great wealth, but that furnished by men of moderate means, who have to invest their money in industries——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. May I speak on the bill for 15 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will have 30 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Chair. I was saying that the principle of employment is that the number of men employed is determined absolutely by the amount of capital invested in productive enterprise. Whether we would change that or not, we cannot change it any more than we could change the law of gravity, and any employment based upon public funds or taxation or appropriations is bound to fall under that law and come duly and expeditiously to an end. We have to rebuild this fallen structure by way of undertaking to encourage the investment of capital in order that men may be employed. There is no doubt about that. But I will make this statement, and I make it after serious thought: A man in the United States with $500, or $5,000, or $10,000, or $50,000,000, who would invest a dollar in any enterprise under these circumstances, and with the threat of this bill hanging over his head, ought to be put into an institution for the feeble-minded and cared for at public expense.

If the taxgatherer or the bureaucrat or the regulator lays his hands upon it, if you get back 10 percent of it, you will be fortunate.

We will never rebuild the country on any other principle.

I have meditated about the depression. I have read a great deal about the depression. I shall have some remarks to make about the depression. It is said it is like others. It may be, and it may not be. Some say it is worse than the depression of the thirties. Others say it is not. Some say it is worse than the depression of the nineties. Others say it is not. I will tell you one thing, Mr. President, which it seems we have not thought about. This is the only depression in the history of America with which the Government has continued to meddle. In my candid opinion, it would not be difficult at any rate to raise a profound suspicion that it has been prolonged and intensified and extended by weight of the incontinent meddling of the Government of the United States. I have written down a list of those meddlings.

We started with the tariff in 1930—in June. The leader on the other side of the Chamber then said that 30 days after the tariff bill passed the whole thing would be over, and we would be on the way to prosperity again. Even the President thought so. What was the consequence? I do not have to answer.

Then we erected, in the name of the farmer, the Farm Board. That was to cure everything. That was in the Republican platform. That was in the campaign addresses of the Republican candidate for the Presidency. That was the hope held dear to the hearts of Democrats as they voted for the same measure. What was the consequence? I do not have to answer. The consequences are here in the despair of 6,000,000 farmers.

Then we had the moratorium with Germany, and that was to clear everything. The consequence of that was that we got inveigled into a situation in which France actually argued that we had had a novation in equity and so had released her from her obligations. Certainly this Republic and its conditions did not improve.

Then we had the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation undoubtedly offered the American banks—and I think the depositors in those banks who were wise enough to draw out their money—a great deal of relief. The wise ones got the Government's money by way of the conduit of the broken banks. I will say that it did some good. Altogether, Mr. President, we are in the presence of the witnesses, are we not? The very collapse and all the horrors which we sought to prevent by the enactment of that measure have befallen us. We will have to agree to that.

Then we had the home-loan bank, which was going to save, as the people thought—I do not think Senators thought it—all the homes of all the distressed people of the United States. But they have not been saved.

They are the remedies. They are the interferences. I make the prediction that the economic historian will review this era and put the stamp of disapproval upon every one of them. Yet we continue to fumble, we continue to meddle, we continue to interfere, and now we undertake to say to the men and women in America who do have work that they shall have only 30 hours' work a week, and we say to industries which are operating, "We are going to take charge of you and fix your hours", and I suppose fix the wages, because the one goes with the other.

Mr. President, one final thought. There has been a great deal of argument made here in the Senate about matters being so bad that we can afford to do anything. Matters are bad. I think matters are worse in America than anybody in America realizes, and I make that statement after much meditation. Matters are worse in America than anybody here realizes, but they can be made much worse than anybody here can ever realize. That should give us pause. I suggest to the Senate and to the Congress and to the American people and to the administration that we pause a little, look back over the 45 months which have elapsed, look over the meddling and the legislation we have perpetrated, and then very solemnly consider whether this whole business of experimentation is not leading us on the way to indescribable depths.

I have some faith in the old ship of state. I believe solemnly that it will be better to anchor the American Republic to the Constitution and ride the storm out; and if peradventure it should go down, at least we would have gone down in a decent ship. I am willing to stand the storm. I know there is a great deal of hardship ahead of us. I do not profess to comprehend the situation, but I know down in my heart that we can make it infinitely worse, and I gravely suspect that that is precisely the process that is going on.

I think, Mr. President, that we labor under something in the nature of hysteria. I would not lay that charge to any Senator, but we fall at times into a sensibility to our situation that so disturbs our poise and so upsets our thinking that we hardly know what we are doing. It is not the hysteria of men who run to and fro and cry in the streets. It is the hysteria that upsets the great will and the firm purpose and the regard for the great traditions which have guided us from the foundation of civilization to this hour, and in disregard of which no one has ever gone forward; and we cannot hope to go.

I have said to myself, Mr. President, since that fateful tragedy yonder on the sea at midnight on Monday of this week that it is not beyond the possibilities that after a little the character of this Republic, the traditions of this Republic, the Constitution of this Republic, all that we mean by "this Republic", can be so affected by legislation that the ship of State in which the fathers sailed and which they handed down to us, and which it is the dearest wish of my life to hand down to those who come after me, my own blood and the blood of all others in our land, may be as complete a wreck as that which we find floating in the Atlantic or resting upon its floor that once serenely sailed the skies, bearing the name, "Akron." [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg to tender an amendment to the bill pending and have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is pending.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not wish to have it considered now. I wish to have it offered and take its proper place on the table for consideration at the conclusion of the amendment now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will lie on the table.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it may lie on the table for future consideration at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I do not share the apprehension over the proposed legislation expressed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. Government must finally make adjustments to serve the overwhelming needs of humanity.

To some of us the 30-hour bill, however imperfect in form and even though destined to constitutional attack, is the embodiment and declaration of a paramount principle. It expresses in substance, superior to its statutory wording, certain long held and publicly declared convictions. A vote in support of it, therefore, rises to the level of the fulfillment of public commitments with respect to both the pending amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the measure of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

The foremost problem of civilization at this hour is unemployment, along the borders of which run the shadows of dreaded unemployment, halting and breaking the courage and independence of those who are still employed. One of the immediate tasks of this administration which cannot be denied or evaded is to come to grips, as this bill in part attempts to do, with this mighty menace. In the absence of some reasonable abatement of the evils of unemployment now blighting the lives of millions of our fellow citizens all other efforts of our present Federal leadership are destined to prove superficial and unavailing. Not only must the Nation halt the deflationary processes which continue to hold us in their remorseless grasp, we must also aid in giving the rank and file of the country the ability by means of earnings which are adequate to sustain fit standards of living sufficient purchasing power to galvanize into action our silent factories and to stir to new and profitable production the idle fields of America. We have been legislating for starving men. It remains for us to provide as soon and so far as practicable, security for ruined men.

One other aspect of the pending bill must be kept in mind. It will not suffice if our present economic tragedy merely results, whether through natural forces or legislation, in divided employment with lessened aggregate opportunities for American workers. Such an outcome will spell no upward surge of compelling and effective consuming power. Widened employment to be properly serviceable to society should be associated with sustained, not reduced, pay for workers, and the full legislative powers of the Congress should be mobilized for that purpose. It is therefore desirable that a supplementary measure having that purpose in view, if the pending measure does not so provide, shall follow legislative action on the pending bill.

It should be added that the vast popular support and enthusiasm marshaled during the first weeks of the present Administration testify in part to the extraordinary talents and leadership of President Roosevelt. We should, however, not forget the reasons for that popular response. The country has acclaimed a pioneer in the field of statesmanship whose swift Presidential action has dared to set aside precedents in an effort to advance remedial legislation. Whether the President has demanded economy in Government with a view to the support of Federal credit or has called for substantial expenditures to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, a stimulated people have followed because his leadership has been bold, original, decisive, and inspired by love of country and humanity. Our future public course demands further experimental initiative, and one need do no more than appeal to the administration's example since the 4th of March of this year to justify a rejection of the tendered amendment of the Senator from Arkansas or to vindicate support for the significant principle presented in the pending bill.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I should like to propound an inquiry to the Senator in charge of the bill regarding a matter that has seriously disturbed a good many people in my State. Wisconsin has the reputation of being the leading dairy State of this Nation, perhaps because there is manufactured in that State more cheese, for instance, than in the other 47 States put together; and it so happens that in the dairy sections of our State, at practically every crossroads, there are little creameries and cheese factories, which are very often one-man affairs. Sometimes these factories are owned by an individual, and frequently are owned by cooperatives. The point about which I wish to inquire is this: Very often they can operate these 1-man creameries with 6 hours a day of labor; but, with varying weather conditions and differences in temperature, it sometimes becomes necessary to run beyond that time for half an hour or an hour or 2 hours. My inquiry is really twofold: First, is it contemplated that an employee who would be the only one there, perhaps, hired by a cooperative, would be considered perhaps the manager and therefore exempt from the operation of the bill, or would it be necessary in each such instance to apply to the Secretary of Labor in order to come within the exemptions that are contemplated? I have had so many inquiries today along that line that I should like to have the observations of the Senator in charge of the bill, if I may.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I will say, certainly, under the state of facts the Senator sets out, that the man who was in charge would be the manager of the business and would need no permit of any kind; neither would the association. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the bill which the Senate is, I hope, to pass today is one of the most important which has ever come before this body, and, in my judgment, it presents one of the most momentous issues which will ever be presented to the Congress. It represents an effort upon the part of Congress to take up the slack of unemployment, which has created a condition so menacing in its possibilities, so fraught with cataclysm and disaster as seriously to threaten the very existence of our whole economic system.

This bill, Mr. President, is designed to reverse the vicious circle which has led to so much economic disaster, so much human misery and suffering, so much menace to the perpetuity of our institutions.

Through the development of the machine, the constant gearing up of industry to mass production, the eagerness of capital to seize for its own greater remuneration every advance in means of production through improvements in the art of the invention of machinery, a condition has been created in which even in normal times we are forced to contemplate a portion of our population, running well into the millions, as being steadily out of employment. When I say "normal times", Mr. President, I mean even such times of illusory and fictitious prosperity as preceded the titanic crash of 1929. If the conditions of that year could be restored, we would still face an unemployment roll of millions.

This mounting unemployment must necessarily affect in a most drastic way the purchasing power of the consuming class, who are also the working class, whether on the farms or in the cities. And when the purchasing power of the consuming class is affected it immediately reacts upon business, upon manufactures, upon production, upon capital return. This again leads to further increase in unemployment, further decline in the mass purchasing power of the consumers, and this to a further fall in production and a decrease in capital's profits. And so we have the vicious circle.

This bill, Mr. President, proposes to reverse the movement in that circle. It proposes to reverse it by starting with the unemployment situation and by limiting the hours of labor in industry, to force a drastic decrease in unemployment, a better and wider distribution among all the potential workers of the work to be done. The improvement in the mass purchasing power must be immediately reflected in an increase in mass consumption, and this, in turn, by increase in production, improvement in business, and betterment in capital returns. So we have the vicious circle made into a beneficent circle.

Mr. President, I know it is said by many that a reduction in the hours of labor will automatically result in a reduction of wages in the same proportion to those now employed. Such has not been the experience of mankind. Exactly the same arguments and predictions have been interposed to oppose every proposal for shortening the hours and improving conditions of labor in the history of the race. The same argument was advanced, the same dire forebodings were expressed, when it was proposed to shorten the workday from 12 hours to 11 and later from 11 to 10 and later from 10 to 8. And in each case these fears were proven unfounded. Shorter work hours have been accompanied by higher wages. Certainly no one would contend that the converse of such arguments as those made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has been demonstrated in the present economic disaster and that the lengthening of work hours has produced higher wages. No one will contend that as the hours of toil in some industries have increased from 8 to 10 to 12—in some cases even to 14 hours—a corresponding increase in wages has been brought to the worker. Far from it. The hearings on this bill before the Judiciary Committee and a staggering mass of other evidence conclusively demonstrate the fact that longer hours of labor have been accompanied by steadily falling wages, increasing unemployment, lowered consumption, and declining production.

But, Mr. President, even if we were to assume for the purpose of argument that temporarily at least this cutting of the hours of labor would result in automatic reduction of wages to those now employed, it would still be in the interest of society and the public welfare and for the workers themselves. It is better that 8,000,000 men work 6 hours a day than that 6,000,000 men work 8 hours a day and the other 2,000,000 be left to starve or eke out a miserable existence eating the bread of charity. For even if the gross amount of the wage for the 6,000,000 employed at 8 hours per day and the 8,000,000 employed at 6 hours per day be conceded to be the same, as an initial proposition, the prospective consumptive power of 8,000,000 self-supporting wage earners must be vastly greater than that of 6,000,000 wage earners and 2,000,000 derelicts dependent upon charity. If this be true, then it must inevitably follow that as the segment of unemployment is cut down or eliminated consumption is increased, production must be speeded up, and wages must of necessity be increased.

So, Mr. President, while naturally I was moved to the point of tears on yesterday, as you, sir, must have been, by the pathetic eloquence of the Senator from Pennsylvania, when, in moving accents, he depicted his heartbreaking solicitude for the welfare of the laboring class and the farmers—eloquence which the distinguished Senator has too often exercised in the advocacy of tariff iniquities, the defense of income-tax refunds to malefactors of great wealth, and the emasculation of the laws against trusts and monopolies—while, as I say, such perfervid pleas for the laborer and the farmer on the part of the Senator must have impressed us all, nevertheless I believe this bill, embodying a great constructive reform, ought to pass and will pass this body.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Was the Senator from Missouri moved to tears by reason of the eloquence of the Senator from Pennsylvania or by reason of his conversion?

Mr. CLARK. I was moved to tears by the eloquence of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

On yesterday, Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] sarcastically remarked that this proposed act should be amended to provide that it should be designated as the "Black Act." In my judgment, such an amendment is unnecessary, because the law will inevitably be known as the Black Act, constituting the chief claim to fame of the Senator from Alabama and standing in the time to come as a shining and impressive monument to the ability, courage, industry, and humanitarian spirit with which the Senator from Alabama has prepared this bill and conducted its course to passage. I may add that in the coming time I believe that the enactment of this bill will stand high upon the list of the achievements of the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate in a discussion of the constitutional features of this bill, which have been discussed here at great length and with such impressive ability on both sides, other than to say that earnest consideration of the principles involved and diligent examination of the precedents cited has led me to the conclusion that the act is constitutional. Furthermore, I agree with the principle laid down by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], that there is nothing in a 5 to 4 decision of the Supreme Court on closely controverted questions of constitutionality which should bind the mind and conscience of a Senator or Representative against voting for the passage of an act which would again submit the same or similar questions to the Court's consideration. There is nothing sacred about the decision of the Supreme Court in the Child Labor case, and I hope to see that decision reversed when the Court passes upon the pending bill.

I was not impressed with the soundness of the very able and ingenious argument of the Senator from Alabama to the effect that Congress by the declaration of an emergency could make constitutional the exercise of powers otherwise unconstitutional. It is precisely in times of stress and emergency that the guaranties and separation of powers of the Constitution should remain most sacred.

Nevertheless, I shall vote against the amendment which I understand is to be offered by the Senator from Idaho striking out the preamble of the bill. While I do not believe that the declaration of an emergency could make constitutional an act otherwise unconstitutional, nevertheless I deem it proper for the Congress, in the exercise of constitutional powers in a matter of such momentous consequence, to set out the circumstances and conditions which have appealed to its legislative judgment in taking such action.

Mr. President, in my personal campaign platform, announced nearly a year and a half ago, I declared for a 6-hour day but not for a 5-day week, it being my idea at that time that the establishment of a 36-hour week would be a sufficiently drastic reduction to largely accomplish the necessary reform. A study of the hearings before the Judiciary Committee, however, has convinced me that the establishment of the 30-hour week is far preferable and that the maintenance of a 6-hour day as against an 8-hour day is so far preferable as to amount almost to necessity. If the principle of the benefits to be derived from reduction of hours of labor be sound, then I believe that we are liable to err here in the direction of not going far enough rather than in the direction of going too far.

I know the undeviating spirit of support which the Senator from Arkansas has given to this legislation, as he formerly gave his support and leadership to the child-labor legislation. I am extremely reluctant to differ with him upon this matter; but, in view of the facts presented in the hearings on this bill, I feel constrained to stand with the author of the bill, the Senator from Alabama, and shall therefore vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. I may say, however, that either with or without the Robinson amendment the measure will amount to a great step forward in the alleviation of our economic disaster, and that with or without the Robinson amendment I will take pride in voting for the Black bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk (Mr. Frazier) called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

INCREASED SALARIES OF LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANY OFFICERS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay a vote on this amendment, and shall take only a moment of time; but some figures published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch I think are of special interest just now not only to the Senate but to the country.

While wages and salaries have been decreasing all along the line, and hours of employment have been increased by big business, it develops here that the great insurance companies of the country whom we have done so much to help through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the machinery that has been provided by the Congress have increased the salaries of their executive officers, in some cases enormously.

I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to two or three of these increases.

For example, the Equitable Life Assurance Society in 1929 paid its president, T. I. Parkinson, $75,000 a year. In 1932, after 3 years of depression, it paid its president $100,000 a year. Instead of taking a cut in salary, he was increased $25,000.

In 1929 one of the company's vice presidents, L. M. Fisher, drew $34,375 for a year's work. In 1932 he drew $40,000.

W. J. Graham, another vice president, in 1929 drew $34,375; but after 3 years of depression that salary had grown to $40,000 in 1932.

D. A. Walker, another vice president, in 1929 drew $17,187; but in 1932, after 3 years of depression, after the wages, salaries, and benefits of employees, veterans, and others all over the country had been reduced enormously, his salary had been increased to $20,000.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.: In 1929 F. H. Ecker, the president of that company, received $175,000 a year for his work. In 1932 his services had become so indispensable to the company that they raised his salary $25,000, and now he gets $200,000 a year.

In 1929 L. A. Lincoln, a vice president of the company, received $66,875. Now he gets $125,000 a year—nearly double.

Other vice presidents and executive officers of that company are raised in pretty much the same proportion as its president. I have the figures here, and will insert them in the RECORD.

Mutual Life Insurance Co.: D. F. Houston, president, in 1929 received $100,000, but in 1932, the last year of the depression, his salary had been increased to $125,000.

Other executive officers of the same company—I intend to put this list in the RECORD—received increases all along the line.

New York Life Insurance Co.: T. A. Buckner, the president, was paid $100,400 in 1929. In 1932 his salary had been raised to $125,400, an increase of $25,000. Other executive officers of the same company likewise received increases.

The Prudential Insurance Co. of America, it is true, did not raise the salary of its president. Its president, E. H. Duffield, in 1929 received $125,000 a year. In 1932, however, he was still receiving $125,000 a year. But one of the vice presidents of that company, who received only $48,000 for his work in 1929, had become so valuable in wrestling with the depression during the 3 years that his salary was raised to $50,000.

All these enormous salaries are being paid by the people. This becomes important to us, because much of the legislation that has been enacted to cure the depression has been presumably enacted in the interest of the big insurance companies.

Mr. President, I will read the concluding paragraph in this article, which is in point:

> Let policyholders who find the doors of these companies closed to them when they apply for loans, when they find Congress, State legislatures, and State insurance commissioners tumbling over themselves in an eager effort to help insurance companies through the depression—let them read these figures and weep.

Mr. President, I ask that this entire article be incorporated in the RECORD. I think it is decidedly important.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

BIG SALARIES

To Dempster MacMurphy, of the Chicago Daily News, must go the palm for discovering a type of job impervious to the depression, namely mutual insurance company executives. The insurance companies themselves have been so hard hit by the depression that public authorities have come to their rescue. For instance, New York and other States have prohibited policy loans and the collection of cash-surrender values except surrenders up to $100 in cases of "extreme need" and loans made for the purpose of paying premiums.

It might be supposed that the mutual companies, inspired by the hardships of their policyholders and the almost universal example of other business, would cut the princely salaries their executives enjoy. Mr. MacMurphy finds that, far from doing this, in many cases insurance-executive salaries are actually higher than they were in the boom year of 1929. He points out that the only company giving evidence that its executives realize a depression has hit the country is the Equitable Life Assurance Society, which recently announced a 15 percent cut in salaries of over $5,000.

Here are the salaries of executives of five leading companies:

Let policyholders who find the doors of these companies shut to them when they apply for loans, who find Congress, State legislatures, and State insurance commissioners tumbling over themselves in an eager effort to help the insurance companies through the depression—let them read these figures and weep.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day I commented briefly on the salaries paid executive officers of large insurance companies in the country. I ask unanimous consent to have added to what I then said this very brief statement.

Since I addressed myself to the Senate I have had an opportunity to see a policy of one of the mutual companies. Most, if not all, of these insurance companies are mutual ones. The largest of all, the Metropolitan, has, I understand, considerably over 50,000,000 policies outstanding. A notation on the back of one of them reads:

> The holder of this policy while it remains in force, after one year from its date, will have a right to vote, either in person or by proxy or by mail. For particulars how to vote, apply to the secretary, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

How many of these more than 50,000,000 policyholders do you suppose had a hand in fixing the compensation of the president at $200,000 and in increasing the compensation of the first vice president from $66,000 to $125,000? And if even a large number of them were dissatisfied with these salaries, how do you suppose they would go about getting together a sufficient number of votes or proxies to reduce the compensation of these officers of a mutual company to the amount they deemed suitable?

It was suggested to me, after concluding my remarks on the subject a while ago, that perhaps the decreased cost of living since 1929 would be the justification sought by executive officers for the vast increases in their large salaries. It has been contended by them that their employees should be ground down to lower wages, to accept tremendous cuts in wages, and to accept lengthened hours of work, because the cost of living is much lower now than it was in 1929. Could the executive officers and officials of the large insurance companies have had that in their minds when they voted to increase their own enormous salaries to still higher figures?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. I wonder if the Senator from Indiana has any information to indicate whether or not these insurance company executives hold memberships in the National Economy League?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have not any direct information on that subject, but the figures in the RECORD and the names of contributors heretofore placed in the RECORD, who have much to do with all these vast corporations, I think probably would answer the Senator's question. I have no doubt they have all been active in the National Economy League.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have before me and had intended to place in the RECORD, but I understand the Senator from Indiana has done it, a list of the salaries in 1929 and 1932. I was absent so I am not sure whether the Senator has done so or not. Did the Senator place that list in the RECORD today?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think it is the same list.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator has not put it in the RECORD, I would like to have him do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; this is the same list that I asked to have incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, has the Senator from Indiana applied the cost-of-living index to the increased salaries which he is discussing?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No. I remember the index. It was suggested in passing the economy bill that we go by an index, and that means setting aside the Constitution and practically having it read that from this time forward the United States Government shall be ruled by an index. The index had to do with the cost of living in 1929 and the cost of living today. It was indicated, I think, that the cost of living is some 23 percent lower now than it was then. That was the excuse given for decreasing the pay of all Government workers. I think the last pay cut was 15 percent. While we reduce the pay of those in the lower brackets all along the line, who spend practically all they make for food and shelter and clothing, the executives of big business in the United States hike their pay to figures never before heard of, even in the most prosperous times.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 158) to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 8, strike out the words "5 days" and insert in lieu thereof the words "36 hours", and on line 9, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight", so as to read:

> That no article or commodity shall be shipped, transported, or delivered in interstate or foreign commerce, which was produced or manufactured in any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States, in which any person was employed or permitted to work more than 36 hours in any week or more than 8 hours in any day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote; therefore I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. NORBECK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], but I understand that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote, and I therefore vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KING (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I am compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 48, as follows:

So the amendment proposed by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, after the word "day" in line 9, page 2, to insert the words "Provided, That this section shall not apply to commodities or articles produced or manufactured by skilled workers paid on a piecework basis."

In this connection I want to read a telegram from a gentleman who represents the Cigar Manufacturers' Association of Tampa. He says:

TAMPA, FLA., April 5, 1933.

Senator D. U. FLETCHER:

Enactment of 30-hour labor bill will close every cigar factory in Tampa. Workers are paid on piecework basis, and at existing wage scale cannot earn enough in 30 hours to support themselves. Exorbitant taxes and other high costs make increase of wages impossible. If enacted bill should contain clause exempting skilled workers paid on piecework basis.

K. I. MCKAY.

I need not enlarge upon that. It states the situation as to a very great industry. There are manufactured in Tampa more than a million clear Havana cigars every day, and the work is done on a piecework basis, not by the hour, not by the day, but on a piecework basis. The effect of this legislation would be to destroy that industry, as stated in this telegram.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BLACK. May the amendment be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 9, after the word "day" the Senator from Florida proposes to insert a colon and the following proviso:

> Provided, That this section shall not apply to commodities or articles produced or manufactured by skilled workers paid on a piecework basis.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, before that is voted on, I desire to state, while I regret exceedingly to disagree with any amendment proposed by my good friend the Senator from Florida, of course, the entire labor of the country would become skilled labor, and on a piecework basis, very shortly after such an amendment as this should be enacted. It would open up a floodgate that would make absolutely inoperative the effects of the bill because it would be an easy matter to go from the setting of wages on the time basis to the setting of wages on the piece basis. For that reason I sincerely hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I voted against the exemption of the canneries, although the State of Louisiana, I suppose, is more concerned in that business than any other State. I voted against it because I do not want the bill to be chiseled so much. I think it would be a big mistake to chisel the bill so much. I hope other Senators, realizing that the exemption of industries in their States may be essential, will remember that the people in my State want this law to apply to our industries as well. We hope it will be made to apply. We do not want any exemptions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, at the end of line 9, insert the following:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to cotton gins.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the business of ginning cotton is seasonal. It lasts only 2 or 3 months in the fall. The cotton is rapidly picked and the gins frequently are compelled to work all night. It would seriously interfere with ginning operations were they not exempted from the bill. I am sure the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] will have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may say that my construction of the bill is just the same as it was with reference to newspapers, that it would not include the cotton gins. They, as a rule, are machines requiring only 1 man working at a time, or sometimes 2.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if that is the construction to be placed on the Senator's bill, would it not be better to adopt the amendment so there could be no doubt about it? Of course, I am sure the Senator would not interfere with cotton gins in the rush of the cotton-ginning season.

Mr. BLACK. I think exactly the same rule that applies to the canning of perishable products, according to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], would apply to the ginning of cotton. For that reason I have no objection to it being made clear. I would have preferred to have that added to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. However, as I said, I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to know just why the bill does not apply to the particular industry of cotton ginning?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that I think it does, and that is the reason why I am offering an amendment to exempt it.

Mr. BORAH. If it does, why should it not apply?

Mr. CONNALLY. This is not a year-round business. Cotton gins operate only 2 or 3 months in the fall. The men who engage in that occupation have other work during the rest of the year. Farmers carry their cotton to the gin and it is imperative that they get quick service. Sometimes they must remain at the cotton gin all night. If we should slow down the gins by permitting them to work only 4 or 5 days in the week, we would very seriously impede the preparation of the cotton for market. It would mean a great waste of the time of the farmer, and his team and wagon would be tied up in the meantime. It would not help the men working at the gin. They would not be benefited at all, but the farmer, on the other hand, would be handicapped and impeded.

Mr. BORAH. Would the terms of the bill apply to threshing machines?

Mr. BLACK. I know nothing about the operation of threshing machines.

Mr. BORAH. They operate only 2 or 3 months in the year.

Mr. BLACK. If the same conditions apply with reference to threshing machines, in my judgment the same action should be taken. Cotton gins are located at small places in the country, not even in villages. There is no place convenient in which to store the cotton. The cotton gins are operated usually by one man. Unless they could work during that short period of time, the farmers would have no opportunity to have their cotton ginned as promptly as it should be done.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not think the threshing machines would come under the terms of the bill anyhow.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would not a flour mill come within the provisions of the bill?

Mr. DILL. A flour mill is something entirely different.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is just one stage of preparation of the wheat, and the threshing is another.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I imagine the provisions of the bill would apply to both. I do not want to join in any brigade of exemptions from the bill, but the tendency seems to be in that direction.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I say that a threshing machine runs only a part of the time during the year. Why ought not they to be excepted, too? I think they should be excepted. I think we ought to say in the bill exactly what we mean. If we mean that we intend to stop threshing machines and cotton gins running more than 2 or 3 days a week, then we ought to say so.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the bill provides—

That no article or commodity shall be shipped, transported, or delivered in interstate or foreign commerce which was produced or manufactured in any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment.

Certainly a threshing machine does not come under the head of any of those categories. It is not a manufacturing establishment. It is not a factory. Certainly it is not a workshop or a quarry. It certainly does not come within the classifications set out in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. My associations with threshing machines has led me to believe that they are workshops. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am not concerned about the exemption of threshing machines, but I do want to impress Members of the Senate with the necessity for exempting cotton gins.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I desire to say again that I have no objection to the amendment on the ground that it is an exemption. I do not think the cotton gin needs exemption, but some Senators do think so, and I accept it just as I did the definition of a newspaper. I do not think the cotton gin comes within the terms of the bill; but since some Senators are apprehensive, certainly I have no objection.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in that I do not like to see so much exempting of too many things from the bill. I thought cotton gins were covered. I was hoping that they were covered. I come from a cotton State. There is nothing about the cotton-gin business that I know of to keep it from operating on a 6-hour shift the same as anything else. It is the simplest mechanism of any manufacturing plant that I know anything about. I was hoping that cotton gins would be covered by the terms of the bill. If we are going to eliminate threshing machines and cotton gins and keep on with exemptions like that, we will have no bill by the time we go very much farther with it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, there is no question in the world in my mind that the bill does not and never did include the cotton gin. Of course, we mean here to divide up labor in the country, but only as it relates to labor in factories and in manufacturing enterprises. I think that sooner or later we will and should come to the normal short working day in every business in the Nation.

Mr. SMITH. Except farming.

Mr. BLACK. But I do not think it would be possible to legislate with reference to the cotton gin in this bill, because it is not engaged in interstate commerce. I never knew one that is.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; it is. Anyone can manufacture a bale of cotton by processing it through a cotton gin.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no product in the country that is so much in interstate commerce as cotton which is manufactured at gins.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, the cotton is in interstate commerce, but the cotton gin is not engaged in interstate commerce at all.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think we make a mistake when we undertake to deal in anything like sectionalism in these exemptions. One great trouble we have had in the South has been that we have always tried to exempt cotton. It does not need it. The whole structure is the same. Cotton is not a perishable commodity at all. It is easily handled. I think it is a mistake to make an exception of cotton gins in the bill, because there is no reason on earth why a cotton gin cannot operate on a 6-hour shift. It is the simplest machinery in the world to operate. All there is to it is 2 or 3 extra farm hands if anyone wants to operate longer than 6 hours. It is a mistake to write an exemption in the bill for cotton gins and then have someone else offer an exception for threshing machines and someone else offer an exemption for spindles, and then someone else come along and offer an exemption for potato machines and some other kind of machines. We will wind up with no bill. I think we ought to vote down these exemptions. I do not see any reason to prefer cotton gins, and I do not believe such an exemption will help the bill at all. If the cotton gins are not covered, we ought not to begin to write exemptions into the bill at all.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, in my judgment, cotton gins are not included in the bill, but if there is any doubt about it, it could be made clear that they are not included. I know something about the ginning of cotton. There are four gins located within half a mile of my residence. Sometimes there will be 40 or 50 or more wagons and trucks there with cotton to be ginned. Other times, perhaps for 2 or 3 hours, there will not be any cotton there to be ginned at all. It is absolutely impossible to pick up a man here and yonder, now and then, to carry on the work. This will not be so much of a detriment to the ginner as to the farmer himself. They come from miles and miles around to the gin bringing their cotton. They take their turns there. Sometimes a man with a bale of cotton will have to sit on his wagon or on his truck or stay nearby for 3 or 4 or 5 hours waiting his turn at the gin. If the employees of that gin were called upon to cease work at the end of a 6-hour period, perhaps it might mean that 25 or 30 or more farmers who had come quite a distance with their cotton would have to wait until the next day, or leave their cotton there in the yard and return to their homes and come back the following day.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I know the Senator probably was raised in the cotton business.

Mr. STEPHENS. No; not in the cotton business, but in a cotton section of the South.

Mr. LONG. He has probably picked cotton or seen it picked, and has seen it ginned. It is not a difficult thing to find cotton-gin labor, is it?

Mr. STEPHENS. Indeed it is, particularly for certain parts of the work. I know a good deal about the operation of a cotton gin, though I do not have any personal interest in one. Some of the work, of course, can be done by almost anyone, but the operation of gin stands—the operation of the gin heads, as we call them—is more technical than the ordinary work. The average man cannot operate a gin. With regard to particular kinds of work in the handling of cotton, like putting on the ties and the bagging and things of that kind, it can be done by the ordinary man.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator see, since our sawmills have shut down, that we have an immense surplus of men capable of running such machinery as a cotton gin?

Mr. STEPHENS. Oh, there are quite a few people who could operate a gin, but here is the difficulty that the Senator overlooks: We will say that I am a ginner, for example. I have my crew there. They are trained. They understand how to facilitate the ginning operations and relieve men who bring their cotton there from having to remain quite a while or perhaps overnight. Today, we will say, there are 100 bales of cotton brought to the gin. Tomorrow there may not be perhaps more than 10 or 15 bales, which will mean that the employees will have but little work to do tomorrow.

The point I am trying to make is that if gins are required to operate under the provisions of this bill, we will absolutely compel the ginner to employ two or three different crews, although it may happen that for weeks there will not be any work for more than one crew to do. Therefore the others, when they came in at the end of the 6-hour period, after loafing all day, perhaps after having a chance to get other employment, which they would not take because they say, "No; we cannot take that; we are going to work at the gin this afternoon" will find that there is no work at the gin for them to do.

If cotton-gin operations are included in the bill frequently, in order that ginners may accommodate the producers of cotton, they will have to have 2 or 3 different crews, and it will work a hardship not only on the ginners, but on the people who are being employed at the gins and on the producers of cotton themselves.

As I said in the beginning, I do not believe that ginning operations are included in this proposed law; but if there is any doubt about that point, it should be made clear that they are not included.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, to those who are familiar with ginning operations it seems to me there need be no argument about the absurdity of having such operations included in the bill. The amount of cotton ginned from day to day will depend on the weather; it will depend on the picking out in the fields. There will be days during the cotton season when there will be no cotton at the gins to speak of and there will be other days when there will be hundreds of bales there.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH. First, let me get through with what I have to say. As the ginning season is so short, not extending over more than 90 days, along at the end of the season, when they are scrapping up the cotton in the field, they have what they call "ginning days." There is not a Senator here who knows enough about cotton even to get up and say anything on the subject but knows that along toward the end of the season they have what are called "ginning days." The amount of cotton to be ginned is so small, they cannot afford to keep the gin running and keep the crews there every day. So they notify the public that they will have 2 or 3 days a week of ginning. During those times they would have to keep the crews on hand for 24 hours, and, of course, shifts would have to be employed.

There is some skill acquired by the Negroes around the gin, Negroes being mostly the ones employed. They become very skilled in putting the bagging and ties on the bale. I presume, perhaps, there are not many Senators here who know what bagging and ties mean, but I am addressing myself to those who do. Skill is required in putting the buckle on and running the press down, and if it becomes necessary to change the crews back and forth, those who know the genius and characteristics of the darkey know that he may be there and he may not be there. If he is given a shift of 6 hours, I will gamble he will not be there when the time comes for him to take his shift. So the adoption of the amendment would work a hardship on no one, and the number employed is negligible.

I recognize, Mr. President, as every Senator here does, that the installation of labor-saving devices in our great factories, resulting in mass production and displacing the human hand ultimately must be reckoned with; it has got to be reckoned with. There is an equity in these discoveries of genius of which the mass of people should be the beneficiaries, but you, Mr. President, and I ought to go at this thing at least with a semblance of something like study and appropriateness.

This bill fixes for all factories the hours of labor. Had I my way I would provide shorter hours in those factories which have availed themselves of the most perfect labor-saving devices. There are some establishments, however, that cannot accommodate themselves to labor-saving devices, and the gin is one of them. From the day that Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin not an improvement has been attached thereto. He solved the problem wonderfully and completely with his first invention. The only addition that has been made to it at all is to adapt it to power, such as electricity and steam, but it could be worked just as readily by hand. Then came the horse gin and the steam gin and the electric gin, but not one single addition or improvement has been made upon the principle. It is a simple thing.

It seems to me that if we are going to endeavor to compensate for the effect of labor-saving devices, with one machine having a capacity to do the work of a hundred men, we ought to take into consideration the equity that the hundred men have in the machine which has taken their place, but not to be so absurd as to project the program into those industries where there has been no labor-saving device made available.

Mr. President, we have as much right to include in this bill the farmers of the country as any others, but who on this floor would dare say, with the multifarious demands of a farm, the change of the season, the cry of nature for immediate attention, that the agricultural industry could accommodate itself to shorter hours of labor and in the main to labor-saving devices? Let us apply our legislation where it is absolutely indicated. I stand here and maintain that in our great factories, to which have been made available the wonderful inventions of the genius of America, we ought to accommodate the hours of labor to the additional power these devices have meant to mass production, but not run into absurdities and make the very principle that you, Mr. President, and I are fighting for obnoxious. Let us make the plea along the line where it is indicated but not set it over things where it is not indicated.

Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. WHEELER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The Senator from Texas is recognized. He has 30 minutes on the bill and 15 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not want 30 minutes; I want about 3.

I am not primarily concerned with the ginner. I am concerned, however, with the community which the ginner serves. The pending bill is supposed to be in the interest of giving somebody a job; it is designed to spread employment. Here is a ginner with 3 or 4 employes; he has work enough to run his gin a whole week. If he only operates for 5 days he has got to have two shifts. We are not going to help employment in that community by such a requirement. During the cotton season every man can get a job either picking cotton or ginning cotton; there is always a large seasonal demand for labor; in fact, labor is imported from the outside. The man who would work at the gin an extra day, if he were not working at the gin would be working out in the cotton field somewhere; and, meanwhile, if we shorten the hours and make the gin shut down, those who otherwise would be employed are going to kill time, and a large proportion of the neighborhood farmers are going to have their business interfered with. Their prompt ginning, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, is going to be interfered with. There will be a crowd of them hanging around the gin killing time, losing time from their own field and their own business in order to give 1 man a job for 1 day. Is there any sense to that? Is there any economy in that? Is that the relief of unemployment? It is increasing unemployment. It is tying up normal activities.

Those who operate the gins are not industrial laborers. The gins are located out in the country. The men who work at the gins for 3 months in the fall work at something else all the rest of the year. They may have farms or they may work on farms; and we are not saving anybody by including gins within the scope of the bill. We are not going to uplift anybody; we are not going to increase anybody's opportunity for employment; we are not going to save anybody economically or in a social-service way. We are simply interfering with the normal activities of people who are trying to attend to their own business and want to be let alone.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Under what head do ginning operations come in the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not certain that such operations come under this bill at all, but I know when this bill gets into the hands of those who want to spread it and make it apply to everything else that they are going to strain it to the breaking point to cover everything. A gin might be held to be a factory; it certainly is a processor, for it converts the raw cotton into lint; it separates the seed. It might be held to be a workshop, because men certainly work with it. I am not prepared to say that under a strict construction it might not be exempted, but if the gin is not included in the bill, what is the objection to saying so? Senators who are objecting to the amendment on the ground that the bill does not cover gins, it seems to me, are killing time. If it is not in the bill, let us say so; if it is, let us say so.

The Senator was concerned about threshing machines. I do not know whether he wants threshing machines included or whether he wants them excluded. I think if we are going to talk about threshing machines we ought to know whether they are included in the bill or whether they are not.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Alabama, as I understand, thinks they are not included.

Mr. CONNALLY. The trouble about it is that the Senator from Alabama is not going to be one of the inspectors who are going to go around, under the provisions of this bill, to see whether they are in or whether they are not in.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator from Alabama is the author of the bill and his opinion is entitled to weight.

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator will follow his opinion when he says that he is in favor of my amendment and that it ought to be agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. He says it ought to be agreed to because it is already included in the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Idaho, however, knows that while the courts will consider debates in the Congress and will give certain weight to what the draftsmen of a bill thought it included, and what Senators thought it included when they voted on it, still the courts are not bound by that, but say that Congress is held to the language which it adopts. However, if the court thinks the bill includes the cotton gins and threshing machines, they will be included, whether the Senator from Idaho thinks so or whether the Senator from Alabama thinks so or whether the Senator from Louisiana thinks so.

The Senator from Louisiana is opposed to excluding cotton gins. Oh, yes; he is going to improve the laboring conditions in connection with cotton gins, but when he does that he is going to interfere with the normal life of 75 percent of the farmers in the various communities; he is going to make them spend a lot of idle time and a lot of extra feed for their animals while they are idle, hanging around the gins, in order to accommodate one man who will get a job for 1 day extra. That is economy!

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is a little out of line——

Mr. CONNALLY. I am always out of line with the Senator from Louisiana when he expresses views like that.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is out of line with himself. He says they will all be lying around just to get a job for one man. If one man or two men are given the jobs in the gin the farmers will not need to lie around. I think the Senator has taken cotton to gin mills, as I have.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; I have.

Mr. LONG. Cotton is not a very perishable product.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly not, but time is perishable, and it is a waste of time if men are compelled to stand around idle.

Mr. LONG. One can see around the cotton gin, as a general rule, a good many men doing nothing. There are frequently 5 or 6 times more men there whittling than are working in the gin.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true, and the doctrine of the Senator would increase the whittling; there would be more whittlers and less labor under the Senator's scheme.

I know something about cotton gins. I am not concerned in any cotton gin at this time, but as a boy I have carried cotton to the gin. Of course, the Senator is right; there are a lot of idlers around cotton gins, waiting for their cotton to be ginned. There are a lot of idlers everywhere. There are a lot of idlers in these factories. There are a lot of idlers around and about the Senate. [Laughter.] There are going to be idlers everywhere; but I am trying to speak for the men who do not want to be idle. I am speaking for the man who has a little farm. He is anxious to get out his cotton. He is anxious to get it ginned. He is anxious to get it to the market. He is anxious to have it transported in interstate commerce. I am not willing to tax 100 men, and disrupt their normal business, to give 1 man a job for 1 day when that man does not need the job, because if he wants to work during the cotton season he can get a job anywhere in the cotton area picking cotton or ginning cotton or hauling cotton; and the Senator from Louisiana, if he has any real cotton in Louisiana, ought to know that fact. That is the fact.

I am asking this for the farmer, for the man who produces the cotton and does not want his normal activity disturbed. There is no lack of jobs for men who want to work in the cotton patch when the cotton is white and ready for the harvest.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am not especially interested in this particular amendment. I agree with the Senator from Texas that there is no harm in excluding this particular operation from the bill when there is a question of doubt as to whether it is in it; but my primary objection to legislation of this kind is not on the basis of the shorter day or the shorter week. I am of the opinion that we shall be compelled to meet the problem of unemployment in prosperous times as well as in times of depression.

While this bill is put squarely on the basis of an emergency, of course, if proved to be of value it would likely be continued after the 2 years are up.

I am of the opinion that under the formula of industry, where we are constantly increasing the product by less hand labor, we are bound to have a large amount of unemployment even though we have comparatively prosperous times. So that I think the Senate must face the problem of the slack in employment.

My objection to this legislation is that law must be rigid; it cannot be flexible; and the law that applies to a case that is obviously one to which it ought to apply would apply with the same force to a case where it would be entirely unnecessary. In other words, we cannot legislate and relieve one situation where there is a crying need for relief without applying the same law to a case where it might prove more injurious than helpful.

I am as certain as I am here that industry will have to come to the shorter week. I think it will do so. The figures that were referred to by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] have been handed to me, brought up to last month, and I find that the average number of hours worked per week during the month of February was 35.9—one tenth less than the number proposed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. Looking over this list of 73 articles, I recognize that in certain types of work, like textiles, there is a considerably longer number of hours than are found in other kinds of manufacturing establishments.

I think there is no doubt that we will ultimately, through industry, adopt the shorter week. First, when we discussed the question of a shorter day and a shorter week, it was put on a humanitarian basis. It was always put upon the ground that it was for the public weal. It also had an economic phase, in that an 8-hour day's work would likely produce a greater product than a 10-hour day because of the weariness that would be entailed by the longer day. So that all legislation in the past limiting the number of hours has been based first upon a humanitarian ground, and secondly upon an economic ground.

That has not been the case here. This legislation, while it has been asserted that it is based on a humanitarian ground, could hardly be alleged with force to be primarily humanitarian. On the other hand, the argument is strictly economic.

I believe thoroughly in staggering labor during times of depression. I think the share-the-work movement has been a great movement; and I cannot see any particular argument against the theory that if there are 30,000 hours of work to do, and a 5-day week would employ so many men while a 6-day week would employ so many less men, the lesser time should be used in the interest of the larger employment. I think that is axiomatic in times of distress, and I would very strongly recommend such a procedure on the part of industry; but my objection to this legislation is that where it cannot be sustained on the basis of interest either of the public or of the individual, it ought to be avoided from the rigidity of law. It ought to be a matter to be worked out and adjusted by industry under the force of public opinion.

I recognize the strength of the statement that industry will not respond unless it is compelled to do so by force of law. There was a time when that was true. That is not as true today as it was in days before, and will not be as true in the future as it is today.

Take the large manufactory that employs thousands of people, that runs all the 24 hours: This bill would be easily workable in a case of that kind because there could be 4 shifts of 6 hours each, as heretofore there may have been 3 shifts of 8 hours each. I can see that a large manufactory can very easily put in operation the 6-hour day and the 5-day week, but when it comes to the average small industry it cannot be worked so well. Take my State, which is typical of every State in the Union. In our average county-seat city there is some particular industry that provides the largest employment for the people of that community.

I have in mind a town not far from where I live, where there is a single manufactory that is the employing agency of nearly all of the labor that is employed. It does not run 24 hours a day. It does not run even two shifts. It operates on the basis of the 8-hour day. It deals wholly in articles of interstate commerce. It sells its products all over the world. This bill will force that single city, with its single manufactory, to cut its hours of labor to the 6-hour day instead of the 8-hour day as at present, at a terrific loss to the people of the city and to the great disturbance of the people who work in that city.

I know what I am talking about. They do not want to be reduced one fourth of their income during a day or a week simply because we are saying that that industry cannot work more than a limited time. It means, Senators, that if we put this law into operation without any modification—and I do not see how a law of this kind can be made flexible, it cannot be done, it has to operate equally on all classes of persons to whom it applies—we are going to put out of business a very great number of the smaller manufactories that cannot possibly compete with the larger ones.

All over my State there are small rubber factories. We have a rubber city at Akron. They employ thousands of people. Some of those managers are requesting us to make some changes in this particular law, stating that they would not oppose it if we would eliminate the shorter day, omit that altogether, and make it a shorter week, so that they might use their discretion in perhaps working more hours one day than another to suit their situation. As I understand, with certain modifications, the great rubber factory is not opposing this legislation; but the small factory that cannot run on these shifts but has the 8-hour day is in competition with these great factories, and the question immediately arises, What is to be the effect on the employment of the large number of people employed in the large number of smaller factories?

They tell me they cannot work under this system. Of course, I take the statement with a grain of salt when employers protest against any particular kind of legislation, because they must primarily look to their ability to proceed in the employment of labor on the basis of a profit. I recognize that there is more or less of selfishness in it. Nevertheless, we must necessarily give some attention to the smaller group that tell me they cannot possibly operate under this law as it is now written if it should become effective. Thus, in the interest of labor itself, especially in that large aggregation of people employed in the unit that works only one shift, in the interest of that element, I think we ought to go slowly in this sort of legislation.

Mr. President, I do not want it understood that I think the principle of shorter time in order to spread work among more laborers is ill-advised. I think it is very sound. But I do not want, under inflexible, rigid legislation, to bring everybody who is dealing in articles manufactured in interstate commerce onto this Crustacean bed that is made the same size for everybody, where some can accommodate themselves to it and others cannot.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I will not take the time allotted on the bill, but I want to offer just one other observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 30 minutes on the bill.

Mr. FESS. I will not speak more than 2 or 3 minutes longer.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator any objection?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection, but I want to call to the attention of the Senator, and also to the attention of the Chair, that the Senator cannot speak more than once on the bill. If he takes 2 or 3 minutes on the bill now, he cannot have any more time on it.

Mr. FESS. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I knew that before he told me.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator knew it, but knowing the Senator so well, I had some doubt.

Mr. FESS. The Senator deals too much in doubts.

Mr. NORRIS. I cannot help it when I am dealing with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. That is the reason why the Senator from Nebraska is always excusable.

Mr. President, there is one item in connection with this bill which is offensive to me, and I refer to what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] said today. I would hesitate to vote for any measure that would penalize an American citizen for working a longer time than the law itself might think he ought to work. One right every American citizen ought to have is the right to be employed, and I do not look with any degree of favor on the theory that when a man has worked 6 hours he should be penalized if he wants any more than the 6 hours. That would leave him only 18 hours for automobiling and other things. If he wants to work longer, the right to work longer ought to be given to him. That feature of the bill is offensive to me. But if industry, which has the power, and labor, the other side, agree to a limitation of the time, that is thoroughly justifiable, and I approve of it. For this particular reason I cannot possibly give the bill my support.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to speak on the amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. On the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will have 15 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If I do not get through what I have to say in my time on the amendment, I may want to speak on the bill; but I will settle that later.

I listened very attentively to the Senator from Ohio, trying to find out on which side of this question he was, and I confess I would still be in doubt if he had not told us just as he finished that he is going to vote against the bill. He concedes, to begin with, that something must be done to take care of the unemployment situation, and that probably the situation confronting us will be a permanent one; that because of the inventions of new machinery and scientific improvements in industry we will have the unemployment situation with us as a permanent proposition, and that this bill is intended to prevent an emergency, and is an emergency proposition.

If it be true that it is an emergency measure—and I concede it is, and I concede the emergency is a permanent one also—then, if the bill will accomplish what is aimed at, will meet the situation, I do not understand why anyone should oppose it. If we are confronted with an unemployment situation which will be permanent and which endangers our very civilization, our whole superstructure of government and of industry, why, then, if any Senator is opposed to this bill, either as an emergency or as a permanent measure, and concedes the necessity of something, why should not he propose something instead? If the Senator from Ohio is right—and I think he is—in the idea that we are faced with a permanent question in the necessity of taking care of unemployment, and if he believes that the hours of labor should be shortened and still cannot vote for this bill, why, with his great, scholarly attainments, has he not presented a substitute?

Let me, if I can, picture a situation which I think properly shows up the question that is confronting us. Let us suppose a man is engaged in the manufacture of some article. For the purpose of our illustration, let us say he employs a thousand men. He operates successfully, and pays his men $5 a day. Let us assume, for the purpose of the illustration, that on the product of every laboring man who works for him he makes a profit of $10 every day. Any other figure would illustrate the point just as well. Out of that $10 profit he must pay the man himself $5, so that he makes $5 profit upon his investment, and upon the product of the labor of a thousand men who work for him he makes $5,000 a day.

Let us suppose that, in accordance with the general experience for several years, an improvement is invented by which, through the installation of machinery, that manufacturer can make the same amount of goods, produce the same number of units, with 500 men less; so he discharges 500 men. In the place of those 500 men he has 500 iron men. They have no families, they have no wives and children to support, they have no food to buy, they do not pay any taxes to keep up the community, they perform no work of an elevating nature anywhere. They eat no food, and, moreover, they will work 24 hours a day. They are ironmen. They are slaves.

This manufacturer buys 500 of these ironmen, without blood and without flesh, and he puts them to work, and with the 500 flesh-and-blood men they produce the same value of product that was produced before the employer had these slaves working for him.

What becomes of the 500 flesh-and-blood men who have been discharged? Multiply the illustration by millions, and you have the condition confronting the country today. It is nobody's fault. So far as I know, nobody is sorry to see new inventions that lessen human labor. But there are three elements in this illustration. First, there is the man who has invested his money, and who is entitled to a reasonable return on it. Second, there are the toil and the sinew of the men who work. They are entitled to a living wage. Third, the people who buy the product have a right to expect that it will be sold to them without an unconscionable profit.

When this employer discharges 500 flesh-and-blood men, he is left then with 500 iron men. Who owns the iron men?

The owner of the factory does. They are his slaves. They do the work of 500 flesh-and-blood men. When he makes $10 profit on each of the men who are working for him he has, for these 500 men, $10 profit for each one of them, meaning $5,000. To each one of the 500 men who are working for him he must pay $5. To the iron man he pays nothing. His profit is increased every time he discharges a flesh-and-blood man and employs an iron man, which he owns.

When that is multiplied, and everything else takes place just like that, what is the result? The result is that eventually—and that time is in front of us now—the 500 men discharged here and the 500 there and 500 elsewhere, amounting to 12,000,000 in all, have lost their purchasing power; they cannot purchase the goods that are manufactured by this factory which I am using as an illustration. The others cannot purchase the goods manufactured by any other factory. What are we going to do about it? Are we helpless? Must we see our ship of civilization sink without making an effort to rescue it?

It is true, just as the Senator from Ohio has said, there will be difficulties in enforcing the law. I have no doubt of it. In some places it will bring a hardship, probably. But who is not willing to sacrifice something when the necessity of preserving our very civilization is at stake?

We must take care of the unemployed. It is not their fault that they are unemployed. If we properly adjust the system there will be no difficulty. It will bring additional pleasure, additional leisure, better education, higher civilization, a better enjoyment of our civilization, if we will adjust this profit. When the iron men bring in an increased profit to the manufacturer, who owns them, he ought to reduce the price the consumer pays; he ought to pay a higher wage to the flesh-and-blood men who still have to work the machines, and he still would have left a higher profit than he gets under the circumstances when he used to work without iron slaves to work for him.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator was referring to a statement made by the Senator from Ohio. I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the 1932 platform of the Republican Party this clause appeared:

> We favor the principle of the shorter workweek and the shorter workday, with its application to Government as well as to private employment, as rapidly and as constructively as conditions will warrant.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio is not here, but I will answer for him. The answer is that he is in favor of it, but he does not want to vote for anything that will do it. He can go before his people and say, "I am in favor of that. I said so on the floor of the Senate"; and he can prove it by the RECORD. Is not that a good defense?

Mr. President, it is not a question of what we would like to do. There are a lot of things that will come about here that I do not like to have come about. We must readjust our civilization or we are going to sink. Nothing was ever said that was truer than what was said by the Senator from Ohio when he stated that the increase of unemployment on account of the invention of new machinery is a permanent proposition. Let us face that fairly and honestly. In the end it will be a blessing. But we must realize that some things we have objected to in the past we shall have to do now whether we want to or not.

If we are not going to pass this bill or something similar to it, then we must give to some board or somebody somewhere the power to adjust the very thing this bill is trying to adjust. How great would be the cry if that were proposed here. We may come to it. We cannot always go on having 12,000,000 people unemployed. I do not believe that we can propose an amendment here that will be satisfactory, that will relieve the small manufacturer and compel the large manufacturer to abide by the law. That was the burden of a great deal of the argument made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. If he believes in it, let him propose an amendment here and let us thresh it out and see what the Senate thinks of it.

I am not saying this is the only way, but it is the best way I can see at this time. If anybody sees a better way, let him present it and let us debate it and discuss it. I would be willing to vote for it as a substitute so soon as I am convinced that it will do the job with less hardship than the bill now before us will do it. But mark my word, Mr. President, we are going to be held responsible for not doing anything unless we make at least an honest and conscientious attempt to do something.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska on the amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I call for a division.

A division was had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is too late in demanding the yeas and nays. Announcement of the result had been made.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then when can a Senator have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before announcement is made of the result of the vote on a demand for a division.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I sent to the desk a few days ago an amendment to the bill. I desire to offer a new amendment instead of the original amendment. The reason why I do this is to carry out the text of the bill as reported to the House by the Labor Committee and also to provide for the importation of products to the United States not manufactured or produced in America. Mr. President, by way of explanation of the amendment I shall speak but briefly.

The idea of a shorter workweek and shorter workday in America to make possible the employment of the millions of our workers now unemployed would be helpful, providing it is properly safeguarded so that such legislation will not create idleness instead of eliminating it.

We have appropriated out of the Public Treasury $4,358,897,635.98 during the second session of the Seventy-second Congress. The laws enacted in this Congress so far will mean additional appropriations for the next fiscal year.

We have passed other emergency legislation to meet this epochal period in our country's history and it remains to be seen how practical its application will be toward relieving the distressed.

There is no question about the dire emergency that exists, but from my viewpoint no constructive steps have been taken that will lead to relief and ameliorate the unrest and anxiety that exists among the laboring people of our land.

Relief bills have been passed amounting to millions and millions of dollars. In fact, all that has been saved in the economy bill in reducing the salaries of the Government employees and taking from the veterans of all wars the protection they have had in the past has been utilized for other purposes and today we are as far away from balancing the Budget as when we started in the administration of President Hoover.

I am for relief, Mr. President, but I must not permit myself to think only in the terms of relief unless it is that kind of relief that is constructive and will place industry and the individual American upon a foundation which will enable him to be a supporter of the Government instead of being supported by it.

This legislation, which has for its purpose the reduction in the number of hours of work, unless properly safeguarded, would mean the loss of what little opportunity for employment remains in America. The production of those manufactured commodities would compete in the American market with products of foreign workers.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator's amendment exclude goods where they have been made by labor working more than 30 hours per week?

Mr. HATFIELD. I shall touch on that a little later if the Senator will permit me to do so. I propose to discuss that phase of my amendment a little later if the Senator will bear with me.

The States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, bordering our neighbor, Canada, where there is a workweek of at least 48 hours, but no law controlling the hours of labor, as compared with a 6-hour day and 5-day week in the United States, as this bill proposes, will be unable to offer work to their industrial workers. With a tariff law inoperative because of the depreciated currency invoked by Canada and other foreign countries, unless the amendment which I have offered that would protect home industry against the long hours of labor permitted by our neighbor, Canada, and other foreign countries, the 6-hour day bill, known as "S. 158," offered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], would be destructive instead of constructive. It would deprive labor in America of employment instead of giving employment to those now unemployed.

Coming back to the State of Maine, that State produces $391,000,000 worth of manufactured goods annually, as shown by the records of the Government, in 1929, as compared with only $49,000,000 worth of raw materials in the six New England States. The great State of Maine, controlling her electrical energy produced by water power and requiring its utilization within the confines of the State, for the purpose of encouraging manufacturers to come into the State of Maine, follows the practice of the Dominion of Canada, which refuses to sell one kilowatt of electrical energy beyond her domain. The same principle applies to the great State of Maine. In so doing the State of Maine has built up her manufacturing industry to something in excess of $391,000,000 a year.

When, Mr. President, we compare the rate for kilowatt-hours in America to the rate charged in Canada, we find that the rate is 6½ mills in some parts of America—for instance, Charleston, W.Va.—as compared with 3 mills charged in Canada. That shows what Canada can do so far as the price of electrical energy is involved in the manufacture of finished products and the production of raw materials. If this bill shall become a law without proper protection being accorded to the industries of America, it means an additional loss to the American wage earner over that which he has sustained up to the present time.

Mr. President, with our present low food and commodity values which, through legislation, we are seeking to increase by reducing production with the thought in mind of increasing the cost to the consumer, it necessarily follows that if American wage earners are to be able to purchase these commodities at higher prices it will be necessary for them to receive a higher wage than now prevails.

However, this bill as reported by the committee seeks to deprive the American wage earner of at least 25 percent of the wages now received by those who are employed.

The sponsors of the bill, as reported by the Committee, fully realize this situation, and yet they fail to protect even the reduced wage income of American workers, and permit the products of foreign workers, made in factories working 10, 12, 14, and in some cases 16 hours a day, to enter into the American market in competition with the products of American workers.

Is it possible that such legislation will add employment opportunities to the army of unemployed? Is it not fair, on the contrary, to assume that such legislation will only force additional hundreds of thousands on the charity lists of our country?

Unless the amendment which I offer is adopted it necessarily means cheaper values in America, which will further involve the farmer; for, after all, it is the purchasing power of the American wage earner that makes the American farmer prosperous and furnishes him a market for his products.

The average tariff rate under the Smoot-Hawley law for the period June 18, 1930, to October 31, 1932, was 16.4. Today imports from England and other European countries are landing in the United States at a production cost of from 30 to 50 percent less than our gold values of such products.

We are told that imports have decreased. In value, that is true; in quantity, in many cases, it is not true.

The imports which compete with products of American labor are now entered at values of from 30 to 60 percent less than the entered values of like and similar articles prior to the passage of the Tariff Act of 1930.

The abandonment of the gold standard by England in September 1931, and approximately 60 other nations soon after, initiated a resumption of the depression from which we were then emerging.

The ability of European and Asiatic manufacturers to offer their products in American markets at a total landed cost less than the American cost of production has forced a substantial curtailment of production in many American factories and, in many instances, complete suspension.

A real emergency does exist, Mr. President, and I favor any kind of rational legislation that will relieve it, but I am not in favor of enacting a law which reduces the hours of toil in America to the great advantage of other countries.

I will favor this legislation when we protect the employment opportunity of the American wage earner when we give him shorter hours; but the wage earners of other countries will not adopt our policy unless we require foreign-made products which compete with products of American labor to be produced under similar working conditions. Foreign-made products are being offered at the present time at anywhere from 30 percent to 60 percent below our cost price of production, and the only reason they are not purchased in greater quantity is due to the lack of the purchasing power of the American consumer. Is it not fair to come to the conclusion that, with the limited purchasing power of the American consumer, he is going to have very little patriotic sentiment in the way of purchasing American-made goods when he must thereby pay a higher price for the essentials of life for those for whose upkeep and education he is responsible?

In 1929 and 1930 Japanese skilled workers received some 2 yen per day of 10 hours. In other words, the Japanese manufacturers received from their workers some 40 hours of labor for the equivalent of 1 ounce of gold. At that time the Japanese yen was valued at about 50 cents in gold. Today, with the Japanese yen valued at something like 20 cents in gold, the same Japanese skilled workers, receiving 2 yen for 10 hours' labor, supply the Japanese manufacturer with 100 hours' labor for the equivalent of the same 1 ounce of gold. It can be readily seen that Japanese workers have not necessarily suffered any reduction in wages, based upon Japanese currency.

The manufacturer in Japan, however, who produces the articles which compete in American markets with the products of American workers has secured a reduction in labor costs of 60 percent.

Without the adoption of the amendments which I suggest it can readily be seen, with a Japanese 10-hour workday with 40 cents gold per day as the wage paid, as against the average price paid the American wage earner, the additional advantage the Japanese manufactured products will have over the products produced by American labor will virtually guarantee Japanese control of the American market, or that part of the American market which the Japanese are interested in serving, such as the pottery and china trade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from West Virginia has expired on the amendment.

Mr. HATFIELD. I will take additional time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 30 minutes on the bill.

Mr. HATFIELD. In other words, Mr. President, foreign nations, both in Europe and Asia, as well as our neighbor to the north, have decreased their production costs through depreciation of their currencies. The work opportunities for millions of American workers have been substantially destroyed by our permitting foreigners to offer their goods to American wholesalers at anywhere from 30 to 60 percent less than the American cost of production.

The American laboring man wants relief, and he wants sound relief, and he can only have sound relief by legislation which protects his employment opportunity.

To permit the products of foreign workmen working longer hours and for less money in the production of competitive goods to enter into our interstate trade while through legislation we bar the products of American workers from similar privileges is, to my mind, most un-American.

The investments made in Canada by Americans amount to approximately $540,593,000. These investments were made for the purpose of producing manufactured goods of the finished type such as chemicals and various other commodities produced under the American flag. They are made up in part or in whole of products not unlike those produced by industries which operate in the great New England section. The same thing is true of the State from which I hail, and especially does it apply to the chemical industry. Why, Mr. President, should we not, when we propose to adopt a program calling for shorter hours of labor, underwrite the American wage earner so that he may have the market which is justly his in the 48 States of the Union?

As I said a while ago, I favor shorter hours for labor. It was an accomplishment of mine in the settlement of the great strike that raged more than 2 years in the State of West Virginia to bring about a shortening of the hours of labor. At that time the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] visited West Virginia, because of a proclamation of martial law which had been put into effect during that period, as a representative of this body.

I did not take advantage of the power given the Governor, as decreed by a majority of the supreme court of the State, which allowed him to try citizens by a martial-law court, nor did I approve any of the findings of the court which I found in operation when I became Governor, but proceeded to the settlement of the strike, which I accomplished. There was adopted an 8-hour law in West Virginia by agreement, and later a statute was passed by the legislature requiring all industries in West Virginia to observe the 8-hour law.

That constructive legislation was enacted during my term as Governor of the State. So, Mr. President, I find no trouble in supporting legislation which is humanitarian and which has for its purpose the protection of the wage earner, but when it is proposed to write upon the Federal statute books a 6-hour-day law at a time when all around us, in Canada, in Mexico, in Central America, in Europe, and in Asia, we find labor engaged in producing the same commodities which are produced by the ingenuity of our own toilers in America, working longer hours, with a smaller consideration paid for their services than is paid to American workmen, I am convinced, unless we protect the manufactured goods as well as the raw materials produced by American workmen so that they may have the American market, that this law will be most destructive.

Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a message from a very distinguished American who has been connected with the labor movement in this country for a great number of years. His name is known to every Senator and to every laboring man throughout this Republic.

I ask that the telegram be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk (Mr. Frazier) read the telegram, as follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y., April 5, 1933.

Hon. HENRY D. HATFIELD,
United States Senator:

The pending 30-hour workweek limitation to products of American labor will prove most harmful unless the bill is broadened to include those products of labor of foreign nations which compete in the American market with the products of American labor. We fear that limiting pending bill to products of American labor will result in work being done in Canadian and foreign branch factories of American concerns as well as products of foreign concerns. Therefore, we respectfully request your forceful action toward the adoption of an amendment which will make the pending bill effective on all manufactured products entering into interstate sale whether the product of American workers or the product of foreign workers. Will appreciate your presenting these views and appeal to Members of Senate before final action on pending bill.

MATTHEW WOLL.

Mr. HATFIELD. I ask now that the amendment that I send to the desk be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK (Mr. Frazier). The Senator from West Virginia proposes, on page 2, line 7, after the words "United States", to insert the words "or in any foreign country."

On page 3, line 1, before the word "commerce", it is proposed to insert the words "or foreign."

At the end of the bill, it is proposed to insert a new section reading as follows:

This act shall not apply to the following commodities or articles produced or manufactured in any foreign country: Tea, coffee, tin, sisal, istle, rubber, fruits not produced in the United States, and unmanufactured spices not produced in the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I suggest to the Senator that there is a further element to which he has not referred. American labor, necessarily limited as we both agree under certain circumstances it should be limited to this shorter workweek, is inevitably forced to a higher production cost of export goods to be sold abroad. Therefore, if we are to assimilate that added hazard abroad, when the foreigner reciprocally comes to our country with his product the Senator is most certainly justified in asking for a differential.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] for his contribution, which is most helpful.

Mr. President, I am not an embargoist. Some Senators may feel that that is the attitude of the Senator from West Virginia because of the many speeches which he has made upon the floor of this body, since he came here in 1929, upon the subject of protection. I am not an embargoist, however, and I do not wish to be classified as such; but I cannot for the life of me understand how we can expect to have prosperous times in America with the competitive labor conditions that exist in Europe, in Asia, and all around us outside of the 48 States of the Union. Especially is this true when it comes to this legislation, which compels the wage earner of America to adhere to the 6-hour day, 5 days a week, as compared with the situation which exists in other countries, plus the depreciated currency, which is being circulated in every European and Asiatic nation with the exception of possibly half a dozen and even in Canada. How we can hope to reduce the hours of labor here, and at the same time expect American labor to have its proportional part in the production of raw and finished products and the consuming power in the purchase of manufactured and farm products, I do not understand.

The same thing is true of the commodities that are produced in the way of raw material in the State of West Virginia. That State is second to the great State of Pennsylvania—and sometimes first—in the production of coal. The same thing is true of gas and oil, lumber and shale, There is only a substantial market for such raw materials when our industries of the finished-product class are in operation.

I submit this amendment, Mr. President. I trust that it may be the pleasure of this body to favor it, and to vote for it, and to adopt it as a part of this legislation; and when that is done this bill will have my whole-hearted support.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, on which the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to have the floor. I wish to say two or three words in connection with the amendment before the roll call is had.

Mr. McNARY. In view of that fact, Mr. President, I withhold the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the request has been made by several Senators that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will restate the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the adoption of this amendment would constitute a departure with reference to the method adopted by this country in dealing with different working conditions here and abroad.

The policy of the protective tariff has been adopted heretofore with the idea of equalizing working conditions here and abroad. This amendment would provide a new method which is a complete departure; and that new method would require that hereafter we provide that goods shall not be shipped into this country from abroad which do not conform to the hours of labor used in this Nation.

It is my judgment that it would be a very serious thing at this time to adopt this amendment. If this should be the law, it is such a complete and radical departure from every idea that has heretofore been advanced that certainly it should not be put on this bill with the necessary result of making it more difficult to pass the measure.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the Senate will not adopt this amendment on this bill at this time, when all possible efforts are being made to bring about better trade relations with the world. I have heard the Senator from West Virginia make many speeches very forcefully exponding his ideas of tariff protection. His argument was that in order to meet the different working conditions here and abroad with reference to working hours and payment of wages we should have a protective tariff. A very high tariff bill was enacted on that basis.

I sincerely hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator knows that the House bill contains a part of this amendment. He has that information, has he not?

Mr. BLACK. I know that. I might state to the Senator that the House bill as drawn was copied from my bill; and the matter referred to by the Senator was later added, as I understand, in the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD].

Mr. BLACK and Mr. CLARK suggested the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk (Mr. Logan) called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

So Mr. HATFIELD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to state my position on the pending bill.

The objective of this 5-day week bill is to help the country and the people of the country to move out of the present deplorable depression.

The principal result that is sought to be attained is to lessen unemployment. The bill seeks to provide jobs for men who want to work by making more jobs available through reduction in the hours of employment in industry.

The bill has been reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee. For weeks hearings were conducted and after hearing all the evidence from all sources—the employer and the employee—the committee almost unanimously voted to recommend to Congress the adoption of a 5-day-week and 6-hour-day plan of employment. Estimates were made before the committee which heard this bill that it might help the unemployment situation by putting 6,000,000 men to work. Certainly this is a desirable end. If anywhere near this number of men and women are put to work as a result of this legislation, it will greatly reduce the welfare expenditures under which our municipal, State, and Federal Governments are staggering.

Many sacrifices will have to be made because of the administration of this law. Employers will have to make large sacrifices; many millions of employees now employed will have to make sacrifices, for the result may be temporary reductions in wages because of the shortening of the hours of labor.

All our people are being called upon to make sacrifices in order to combat present depressed economic conditions. None has been called upon to make greater sacrifices than our war veterans. Innocent bank depositors everywhere have been forced to make sacrifices through the emergency laws stabilizing banking. Taxpayers are making heavy sacrifices. Now the captains of industry and the employees must suffer inconveniences and the hardships resulting from temporary readjustment plans in the interest of the unemployed.

This legislation should result also in increasing purchasing power, in reducing hunger, and in lessening the jobless army. While wages may be reduced temporarily, in the end they should go up instead of down.

It is an emergency measure. It is limited to 2 years. It is somewhat experimental, but everything we are doing today is more or less experimental. It may not be workable. It may raise serious constitutional questions. It may be necessary to make changes in the proposal if in practice it does not meet the desideratum sought. It is certain we can never get out of this economic depression until we provide jobs for many of the unemployed. This measure looks in that direction. This measure moves in that direction. It will bring hope to all and opportunity to many who are now jobless. Mr. President, for these reasons I shall vote for the measure.

Letters have come to me from employers in my State, many of them in opposition to this legislation. But one has come that is refreshing, that is progressive, that shows vision. I want to read it to the Senate. I shall refrain from mentioning the name of the company because I have not permission to use its name. It is a company well known to myself. The letter reads:

APRIL 4, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator of Massachusetts, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Usually I never mix up in politics, but the 30 hour week law is something of such importance to the manufacturers of the United States that I would be only too glad to have you spend 3 minutes to read my lines.

The 30 hour law, in my opinion, would be the rebirth of the textile industry in Massachusetts, provided the law is a national one. The textile industries of Massachusetts could double or even triple their labor (and there is plenty of textile labor available) and this would create a shortage in the labor market, thereby eliminating, step by step, the extremely low wages now paid in Massachusetts. The same thing would happen to textiles in the South, only much more severe. No minimum wage would be required on the new law and there would be no talk of paying a man the same for 30 hours as for 48 hours. The natural law of demand and supply would enter into the labor market and as soon as the shortage of labor was felt the rates would automatically go up.

During the year 1932 we employed in our yarn company on the average of 600 people, and where it is necessary for us to run nights, we would employ about 2,000 under the new law. We had an average pay roll of approximately $6,000, and this, without any question, would be considerably increased after the 30 hour law was enforced.

Only such manufacturers, who are, in my mind, suckers squeezing out the last penny from labor, would cry against such a law which, for the time being, is the only solution to the labor situation and the only means of creating confidence and prosperity again.

With kindest personal regards,

Mr. President, there is a letter from a manufacturer with vision, from a manufacturer who has sympathy with his toilers, from a manufacturer who appreciates the serious employment condition in the country. A few others who are working overtime report that this will increase their employees. We have been voting legislation in the interest of the bankers, the insurance company, the railroads, against the veterans, against the Government employees. Here is a measure to do something for the unemployed, to bring hope and promise and opportunity to them. I do not propose, regardless of some protests, to refrain from showing to the people of the country in this period of depression and destitution that we are thinking about the unemployed, that we are thinking about the jobless, that we desire to spread out the available jobs, and make, if possible, an opportunity to have fewer unemployed, to have fewer people penniless in this country.

With especial pleasure I shall vote for the measure. It is not perfect. I wish the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] might have been adopted. Had he provided that the hours of labor should be limited to 5 days a week, I would have voted for it, but because it was so drafted that men could be employed for certain hours 6 days in the week I could not see my way clear to vote for it.

I say this is experimental, but, I repeat, most of our emergency legislation we have done is experimental. Much we have done we may have to undo. No man knows from day to day what is ahead of us, what changes new conditions will necessitate. But here at least is an honest attempt made by members of one of the most earnest and able committees of this body and of this Congress. The bill ought to pass. It will, I trust, prove to be a hope, a promise, a ray of cheer and sunshine amidst the darkness and gloom that now surrounds the millions of the unemployed in the country.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 6, after the word "until", strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty."

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, there are so many changes that will have to be made in so many of the factories that the adoption of this amendment is essential to give them time to effect those necessary changes. There are many factories where new machinery will have to be installed, where new vats for the manufacture of such articles as rubber, rayon, and similar articles will have to be installed, and where many changes will have to be made to enable the mills and factories to carry on under the law. Therefore I hope the amendment will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I send to the desk and offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 9, after the word "day", insert the following:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to emergency repair crews.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, in a great many factories there is occasionally some breakdown in engines, boilers, and so forth, where it is impossible to have an emergency engineer, electrician, and so forth, waiting merely for something of that kind to happen. Where our regular mechanics, engineers, electricians, and so forth, have been working regular hours, as proposed in the bill, we would not be able to fix up the machinery so it might be operated the following day. The amendment is to cover such emergencies as that. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it is my judgment that the situation which the Senator describes is covered and amply taken care of by an amendment already adopted. It is my further belief that the amendment is so uncertain in its language that it might jeopardize the entire bill. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are two committee amendments which should be disposed of at this time and which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 9, after the word "day", the committee proposes to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to commodities or articles produced or manufactured before the enactment of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, after line 5, the committee proposes to insert the following new section:

SEC. 3. This act shall not become effective until 30 days after the date of its enactment, and it shall not apply to commodities or articles produced or manufactured prior to the date it becomes effective; and this act shall remain in force for 2 years after the date it becomes effective.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the author of the bill, I would say that we have made no provision for creameries and condensers. One who is familiar with the milk industry must realize that milk flows every day in the week and that the creameries and condensers must operate 7 days in the week. I hope the Senator will be willing to permit the insertion in the amendment already adopted of the words "milk and milk products", so that it would read:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce fish, seafood, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character, or milk and milk products.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will offer that as a separate amendment. Otherwise it would be necessary to reconsider the amendment already agreed to, and I do not want to do that. I have given much consideration to the question of creameries. I do not think the provisions of the bill could possibly apply to a creamery or to any sort of place where milk is handled. As to the condensers, they are generally located in a community or town where they can easily get the necessary additional help.

Mr. COPELAND. Take, for instance, the matter of milk that is supplied to the city of New York. The city of New York receives milk from seven States. Of course the farmers are taking the milk every day to the machines. Milk being a perishable product, it is taken to the condensers immediately. I shall be very glad to please the Senator by offering it as a separate amendment, but I desire to impress upon the Senate that here we have already provided for perishable food like fish.

Mr. DILL. But that is because of the use of the word "cannery" in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. But condensers can the milk.

Mr. DILL. There is nothing about a condenser that makes it necessary to segregate it. I have no objection at all if the Senator wants to offer it as a separate amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad to accommodate the Senator in that way, although I think there is nothing distinctive about the amendment already adopted. I do want to impress upon Senators the importance of making this distinction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York ask unanimous consent to reconsider the amendment previously adopted?

Mr. COPELAND. No; I will not do that. I will offer my amendment as a separate amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to milk.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that he have the amendment read "milk and milk products."

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is well, but we do not care to include butter and cheese, do we?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Butter is very perishable. Cream is a product of milk and it is perishable.

Mr. DILL. There is nothing about butter or cheese that is a product of a factory or a mill or manufacturing establishment, is there? Are not those products of milk directly?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But they are produced in plants. Surely the Senator from Washington can have no objection to including them.

Mr. DILL. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, yes. We have telegrams from all over the United States about it. I had prepared an amendment which I desired to offer, but I shall be glad to withhold it if the Senator from New York will have his amendment include "milk and milk products."

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will then support the Senator's amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have an amendment by which I want to exempt farm commodities and products thereof that are seasonable and perishable, which includes the very things the Senator from New York has in mind.

Mr. COPELAND. Have we not already done that in the amendment which has been adopted? It applies to all fruits or vegetables of a perishable nature or character. That has already been adopted.

Mr. DICKINSON. But that is limited to fish, seafood, fruits, and vegetables, while there are many products of the farm, such as milk, butter, cheese, and meat products, that are included in this amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BLACK. What is before the Senate now? Is there any amendment before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has offered an amendment. He has read it himself; it has not been reported officially, though, to the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sure that nobody has any desire to hurry us unduly. This is a matter of great importance. Now, let me ask the Senator from Iowa to repeat the language of his amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to offer this amendment, and I have been trying to be recognized for that purpose. On page 2, line 3, insert, after the word "commodity", the following:

except farm articles, commodities, or products thereof, of a seasonal and perishable character.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment and I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana. Would it not be better to say "seasonal or perishable"?

Mr. DICKINSON. The trouble is that there may be some seasonal farm commodities which are not perishable.

Mr. COPELAND. The language the Senator has read, however, might be interpreted as meaning that the product must be both seasonal and perishable.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no. I understand that many vegetables and fruits are seasonal——

Mr. COPELAND. I think we could put in the word "or."

Mr. DICKINSON. That would be all right. I think that is a better form, Mr. President, than that proposed by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New York perfect his amendment so that it may be reported?

Mr. COPELAND. I will accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. I send the amendment to the clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa, in the time of the Senator from New York, offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 3, after the word "commodity", it is proposed to insert the following:

except farm articles, commodities, or the products thereof, of a seasonal and/or perishable character.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York, or whoever has the floor, yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I do not think any of us would have any objection to writing the word "milk" in as an exception, but I had hoped the Senator from New York would stick to his original plan and not go beyond milk and try to include milk products. The amendment the Senator from Iowa has persuaded the Senator from New York to accept includes a great many commodities as to which we have already rejected amendments. I have not been able to see the amendment. I should like to have a copy of it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that if this amendment were adopted it would apply to every flour mill in the United States; it would apply to every packing house in the United States; it would apply to every industry in the United States that processes commodities grown on the farm, because all such products are seasonal.

Mr. DICKINSON. But they are not all perishable.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] proposed an amendment yesterday—I do not know whether the Senator from New York was here at the time—which included cheese and butter and articles of that sort, and on a roll call the Senate turned down the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, I see no particular reason why cheese and butter should be exempt from the operation of the bill; but I think there should be an exemption in the case of those articles which are made from fluid milk, particularly fresh fluid milk which is brought into a creamery or condenser every day of the week and which must be processed at once in order to be prepared for market.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In latter years it has become very important to make butter out of sweet cream, and in order to be able to preserve the sweet cream, and have it made into butter at the proper time, it is essential that there be no delay and no hitch in the transfer of the cream to the creamery. Butter made out of sweet cream carries a premium of from 3 to 5 cents a pound. If the amendment should not be included in the bill, I am informed by processors of butter that in large central plants known as "dairy cooperativee", the industry will be tied up and hampered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what word in the bill would justify that interpretation?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That was the information given to me by them.

Mr. DILL. But they had not a copy of the bill before them. I want the Senator to look at the bill and indicate what words in the bill justify such an interpretation. I am very anxious to protect farm products, if it is necessary to protect them, but I do not think there is anything in the bill that makes it necessary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator point out how it would be inconsistent with the bill or in any way hamper its object to make the exemption proposed?

Mr. DILL. It would broaden the bill to such an extent as to include many things that nobody had any idea of including.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What products are included except butter and milk?

Mr. DILL. It includes all farm products of a seasonal and perishable character.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not talking about that.

Mr. DILL. That is what the amendment provides.

Mr. LONG. Then, I take it, the Senator from Minnesota is not in favor of the amendment that is now pending?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I leave that to the Senator from New York, who accepted the amendment. I myself think the amendment is pretty broad.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement regarding this amendment. It is said that it is too broad. The amendment is offered purely in the interest of the farmer. I want to suggest that out in the rural sections there are poultry-processing plants where poultry is picked, dressed, and boxed for market. That industry is purely seasonal; the product is a perishable one, and yet such plants are covered under the wording of this bill as manufacturing plants because they are purely processing plants.

Next I want to call attention to the fact that cooperative creameries do not have regular runs every day. Some days the buttermaker will work for 2 hours and on other days 14 hours, and yet his product is covered by this bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Do I understand the Senator to say he thinks that a creamery where cream is separated and made into butter is a manufacturing plant?

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly it is; it cannot be interpreted in any other way. No one would interpret this bill in such a way as to say that it did not cover such a plant or poultry-processing plants and others I have just described.

Mr. DILL. I do not agree with the Senator. All that is done in such a poultry plant is to dress the poultry.

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; but that is processing the poultry. All that is done in a packing plant is to kill the cattle and dress the meat.

Mr. DILL. This bill does not say "processing plant"; it says "manufacturing plant"; and every word in it indicates that it refers to manufacturing processes.

Mr. DICKINSON. What I refer to is a manufacturing process.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, what do they manufacture in a poultry-dressing plant?

Mr. DICKINSON. They take the live fowl and make of it an edible commodity to be cooked.

Mr. CLARK. They manufacture a live fowl into a dead fowl. That is all they do, is it not?

Mr. DICKINSON. What is done at a ginning mill? It merely separates the cotton from the seed; that is all. It separates the good part from the bad part.

Mr. CLARK. But cotton gins are not included in this bill.

Mr. LONG. We voted down the amendment in regard to cotton gins.

Mr. DICKINSON. Such plants as those to which I have referred are processing plants, and it will be found that they are included in the bill when it is interpreted.

Now let us go a little bit further. The same process exactly with reference to poultry, to which I have referred, takes place in the packing plants handling cattle which the Senator from Alabama wants to have made subject to this bill. I want to suggest that the great bulk of the farm produce covered by the amendment is processed by people who live in the little communities nearby. They come in as chickens pickers for a little while; they come in as workers in the produce plants for a brief season, as at berry-picking time, and so forth and so on; yet in this bill they are going to be permitted to work no longer than 6 hours a day and then be compelled to quit. I do not see how anyone can interpret the bill in any other way. The author of the bill insists that the packing plants must be kept in, and there is absolutely nothing done in a packing plant that is not done in the processing or dressing of poultry in what we call our produce houses, which are scattered all over the middle-western area.

Mr. President, we also hear reference to the word "factory." What is a creamery but a factory, a place where butter is produced? What is a plant where cheese is produced except a factory where milk and cream are converted into cheese? That is all it is. The same thing is true of poultry plants.

If the Senate wants to hamstring the agricultural section of the country, why, this is their opportunity; but I want to suggest that the bill is very far-reaching, and either the interpretation of it by its author is wrong or we will have included in it every little cooperative creamery, every little poultry-processing plant, every little cheese factory there is in the United States, although these little plants are operated largely by the people who grow the produce themselves and process it and get it ready for market.

Mr. President, I understand that the bill, as drawn, is for the purpose of bringing about a larger degree of factory employment. It is not intended that it should cover the small units such as I am trying to exempt at the present time. I sincerely hope that we can get a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment. I want to see how many Senators there are who want to protect the real producers of farm products from being hamstrung under this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair, in his capacity as a Senator, inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether the words "seasonal or perishable" are intended to apply to the farm articles or to the products of the farm articles?

Mr. DICKINSON. To the farm articles.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not so sure that that is the way the amendment, if adopted, will be interpreted, because the limitation seems to apply to the products of such articles. The Chair does not know whether the Senator intended it in that way or not. It is entirely conceivable that an article that would be perishable as an agricultural product on the farm might not be perishable after a certain process. The Chair simply wanted to know how the Senator wanted the limitation put.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my intention that agricultural articles, commodities, or the products thereof, that are seasonal and perishable shall be covered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. I ask the question because I am for his bill; but my colleague and I have received telegrams from creameries in the State of California pleading very persuasively that they be eliminated from the scope of the bill. Does the Senator from Alabama construe the bill to include community creameries and their products?

Mr. BLACK. I might say to the Senator that, in the first place, all agricultural products are eliminated by simply not being included while they are agricultural products. Whether the kind of creamery the Senator refers to, with which he is, perhaps, more familiar than I am, can come within the definition of "mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment", I cannot say; but my opinion would be, with the limited knowledge I have of the kind of products the Senator is talking about, that it would not be. That would be my opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will pardon me, I wanted to have an authoritative utterance upon the proposition, because my colleague and myself construed the bill just exactly as he does—that there need be no apprehension on the part of these creameries as to being included within the purview of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am at a loss to know what these small creameries would be called if they are not manufacturing establishments. If they are not in a sense either factories or manufacturing establishments, I do not know what they would be called. They do manufacture, and they do process and create; and it seems to me that if there is any doubt about this matter the doubt ought to be removed by an explicit statement.

I have been looking up the term in the dictionary, and I find that "manufacturing process" or "manufacturing establishment" is a pretty broad term. I have received two telegrams on the subject during the last hour.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has an amendment applicable alone to these creameries; has he not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. To milk and its products.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would relieve the situation, and remove any doubt; and, inasmuch as the bill is construed by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, its progenitor, as being of that character, it would do no harm, particularly in view of what has been said by the Senator from Idaho, to put that amendment in the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] will offer an amendment to cover milk and milk products; but this amendment is so broad that it would leave the act in a very vague and suspended condition as to whether it would affect anything.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, we are just as anxious to cover the small poultry-processing plant as we are to cover the small creamery. It may be that poultry does not amount to much down in Louisiana, but it brings into Iowa more money than practically any other product we produce.

Mr. LONG. I do not think killing and skinning a chicken could very well be called manufacturing.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, yes. Exactly the same process is gone through there as in the packing plant. There is no question about it.

Mr. LONG. I do not think skinning and picking the feathers off a chicken can be called manufacturing. That is about all that you do. I think you treat chickens down there about the same way that they are treated elsewhere. You cannot pull anything but the feathers and the head off them, and that is not manufacturing.

Mr. DICKINSON. But the way it is done makes a great deal of difference as to whether or not they are salable.

Mr. LONG. That depends on whether or not the chicken is as good.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this whole question is very much involved and very much confused, and it ought to be clarified. In fact, if it is not clarified, in my judgment, any one would be justified in voting against the bill.

It has been openly avowed here from the beginning that there was no disposition and no intention to bring within the terms of the bill agricultural or farm products in their broad general terms.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I may state that I have talked to several Senators who are interested in this subject, and they state that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has a clarifying amendment which I have not read.

Mr. GEORGE. His amendment is only as to milk.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know exactly the terms of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it is confined to milk.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Milk and its products.

Mr. GEORGE. That is just one phase of farm life. It is only one phase, though it is an important one; but all the agricultural products of this country, ranging under congressional definition from the edible fruits of the forest, including maple sirup, including naval stores—that is, gum turpentine and resin—including ordinary cane sirup, undergo some form of processing. That is manufacturing, and there is no need of quibbling about it.

This bill as it stands, and administered only literally—not strictly—will include practically everything that leaves the farm in a raw state, because at this time there is some processing in connection with practically every farm product grown. Of course dairy products are manufactured products or processed products. The ordinary cane that is grown is by each farmer converted either into the form of a sirup or a sugar and sold as a raw farm product. The ordinary maple sirup undergoes a certain process; and the raw gum or drippings as they come from the tree are actually converted by a certain process into an edible product.

I suggest to the Senator that as soon as this amendment is out of the way, I will offer a broad general amendment that nothing in the bill shall apply to any agricultural or farm product in the condition in which it is ordinarily prepared for market by the original producer. That will solve the entire problem. If a man goes beyond that, he is manufacturing, and there is no more reason for excluding one form of manufacture than another; but I submit to the author of the bill that if he will simply provide that nothing in the bill shall apply to farm products and agricultural products in the condition in which they are ordinarily and usually sold on the market by the original producer, then the raw products will be brought into the market; and thereafter, when anyone processes or manufactures them and goes beyond the restrictions imposed in this bill, he will be excluded from interstate commerce.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. DICKINSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield first to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me ask my friend from Georgia whether the proposed amendment which I have accepted, but which was written by the Senator from Iowa, does not cover what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. GEORGE. No; it does not, because it is "seasonal and/or perishable."

Take the case of wool. That is a farm product. Do you want to exclude that from interstate commerce, and all woolen goods, simply and solely because the farmer who feeds the sheep, brings in the sheep, and shears the sheep converts that wool through some sort of processing into a merchantable and marketable form?

Cotton is processed, beyond all doubt. The separation of the lint from the seed is the first necessary step, and an important step, in the manufacture of all cotton textiles. Under this bill undoubtedly ginned cotton is processed, and it has passed through a stage of manufacture. It is simply idle to say that that is not true.

This bill can be simplified by excepting from it anything grown in its raw state and processed no further than is necessary for the marketing of the product by the original producer. That will end all of these difficulties.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I suggest, if the Senator is agreeable to it, that we vote on the other amendment. As I stated to the Senator today, I have never construed that this measure should go any further than has been stated by him here.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that; but I understand that it does.

Mr. BLACK. I think the matter can be disposed of satisfactorily if we will vote now on this amendment, which is not broad enough to include flour mills and other things that, of course, none of us want to include.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly; that would be manufacturing. The producer of the raw product, of course, does not convert it into flour.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. DICKINSON. I should like to inquire whether or not, in the judgment of the Senator from Georgia, his amendment would cover what is known as the cooperative creamery that takes our raw milk and converts it into butter, or whether it would cover the processing plants for dressing poultry that have grown up in all of our little country localities.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think it would cover processing carried on by the cooperative, because the product is not usually sold by the original producer in the form in which the cooperative puts it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Then, if my amendment should be defeated and the Senator's amendment should be accepted, the cooperative creamery or the poultry-dressing plant or the cheese factory would have no protection from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. If there are other exceptions that ought to be made, they might well be made; but certainly this exception is one that is necessary to be made, or else we are going to find ourselves with the basic raw material having been worked on by somebody more than 6 hours a day in a 5-day week.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If I understood the Senator correctly, he referred to the processing of the original producer. I should like to ask the Senator if he considers that the production of butter in a creamery owned by the producers themselves would not be a processing process by the original producer.

Mr. GEORGE. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that such processing might be included in the definition which I gave. It occurred to me at first that it might not be, but on reflection it may be included. It would be a very simple matter to say, "including processing by cooperatives", or "including cooperative processing by groups of producers."

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me, the same point that the Senator is making would apply to the ginning of cotton.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. SMITH. That is processed for the farmer, and then he disposes of the cotton after it has been processed. The same thing would be true in his case more indirectly, but the principle is the same as that stated by the Senator from Minnesota. It is a processing by the farmer for a more convenient form of marketing of his product.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the difference. These products of the dairy are perishable, while cotton is not.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me, the element of whether or not it is perishable should not enter into this question, for the reason that the Senator from Georgia is trying to exempt from the operation of this bill those processes which are essential to the farmer individually in order to enable him more conveniently to dispose of his product.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not quarreling with that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is all very bewildering. We have been told for days that this bill confers inestimable benefits upon the working people of the country; and yet here we see, for hours upon hours, Senators eagerly trying to exempt the working people of their own States from the benefits of this beneficent bill.

Will not some Senator who believes in the bill kindly explain why it is that he does not want the workingpeople of his own State to receive its blessings? It is quite past our comprehension.

Mr. COPELAND, Mr. DICKINSON, and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, regardless of the discussion as to other products, I want to say to the Senator that unless some provision is made for milk and milk products, it will mean that the farmers who now sell milk which goes into the New York market, farmers selling milk to creameries in Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Vermont and Massachusetts, and the cream products from Ohio and Michigan and Minnesota and Wisconsin will be deprived of their market. Unless some provision is made to cover these products, they cannot be taken in interstate commerce to the New York market or any other eastern market.

It is necessary that we find some way to protect the condenseries and the creameries in order that the products which have been processed in these various establishments shall not be excluded from interstate commerce.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to suggest that in 1929 there were 3,527 creameries——

Mr. BLACK. A point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, I do not want to disturb any argument, but it seems, if I am not mistaken, that on this particular amendment, which I believe we can dispose of if permitted to vote on it, both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Iowa have already spoken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as modified.

Mr. DICKINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 9, after the word "effective", the Senator from Minnesota moves to insert the words "or to milk and/or its products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. This amendment will not be in order unless the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask what is the amendment offered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will state the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 9, in the committee amendment which has been agreed to, the Senator from Minnesota offers the following amendment: After the word "effective", to insert the words "or to milk and/or its products."

Mr. BLACK. Before we vote on that I should like to ask the Senator for his construction of the effect of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question first is whether or not the Senate will reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Before we vote on that, I desire to have the Senator from Minnesota, if it is satisfactory, explain the effect of the amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, the amendment was prepared before the committee amendment was adopted, and I was not aware that the committee amendment had been adopted. The fact that it has been agreed to makes it necessary that we reconsider the vote by which it was agreed to.

However, Mr. President, I can offer the amendment for insertion at another place in the bill, so as not to require a reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to. On page 2, line 3, after the word "commodity", I will ask to have inserted the words "except milk or its products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, in part of the original bill, line 3, after the word "commodity", the Senator from Minnesota moves to insert the words "except milk and/or its products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not understand from the Senator from Minnesota that he considers that this amendment is drawn in such a way that it would apply to a milk-canning factory.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think it would. Milk is always perishable until it is processed. I think it would.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator think it would apply to such a plant as the Horlick plant?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think it would. I am not familiar with the canning of milk, but I assume that it would.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think we are going a little bit too fast. I had no idea that this was contemplated. I think that the Borden Co. and the Horlick Milk Co. and the Powdered Milk Co. would be excepted from this law under the Senator's amendment, would they not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I rather think they would be. I do not know enough about the canning of milk to be able to state whether it would be necessary to exempt them in order to preserve the quality of the milk and keep it from being destroyed.

Mr. President, I have in mind particularly cooperative creameries and distributors of fresh milk to the cities, milk in the perishable state. Whether or not it would affect a canning factory, I do not know. I do not know whether a milk-canning factory must have the milk sweet or whether it can take it after it has become sour.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want to be frank about the matter. Of course it would cover condenseries, such as Horlicks, Nestle's, and so forth. But let it be borne in mind that in the collecting places, where this milk is taken every day in the week, it has to be received on Sundays and other days, because it must come in fresh form. The time of work is very short, in the mornings on Sundays, no doubt, but, as I view it, if these States are to be protected and the farmers are to be protected in the production of milk and in the establishment of the manufacturing and processing, such an amendment is absolutely necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is obvious that the bill as it now stands would affect all pending contracts for future delivery. The evident unfairness of that situation leads me to suggest the amendment which I now send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 9, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] moves to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no manufacturer who is bound by an existing contract to furnish goods or materials for a specified time in definite quantities shall be included by the provisions of this act in the shipment of said goods or materials or any goods or materials which it is necessary to produce to carry out the provisions of such a contract.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if that amendment should be adopted, I would judge that the contracts now in existence, or those in existence between now and the 30 days after the passage of the bill, would multiply to such an extent that there would be very few people who would get any benefit under the bill.

Mr. REED. We could remove that objection by changing the word "now" to read "on April 1, 1933."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I see no reason why those who have made contracts should be given any advantage over those who have not.

Mr. REED. The Senator stated yesterday that this legislation would result in an increased wage cost in the production of manufactured articles, and it is very evident that those who would be covered by the amendment ought to be in a different position from others.

Mr. BLACK. I certainly hope the legislation is going to result in an increased wage cost, and I certainly hope this amendment will be defeated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CUTTING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this matter, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. Did the Senator from Pennsylvania accept the suggestion fixing the date at April 1, 1933?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the amendment has been modified at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania fixing the date at April 1 of the present year.

Mr. COPELAND. I vote "yea."

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Virginia (Mr. GLASS) has a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. CUTTING). I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLER], the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], and the senior Senator from Navada [Mr. PITTMAN] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. BYRD. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which, I understand, the Senator from Alabama is willing to accept. I have tried to restrict it entirely to agricultural or farm products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK (Mr. Frazier). The Senator from Georgia offers the following amendment, to be added at the end of the bill:

Nothing in this act shall apply to agricultural or farm products processed for first sale by the original producer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia just the intent of the amendment? Does it apply to all farm products which may be in any way processed?

Mr. GEORGE. It excludes from the provisions of the bill all farm products in the raw stage when offered to the market by the original producer, because, clearly, there has been no manufacturing then. Therefore the bill has no application to them.

Mr. BORAH. They would not be included in the provisions of the bill without the amendment, would they?

Mr. GEORGE. There is some question about it. I think there is a processing carried on by the farmer in certain instances, a necessary processing which he must carry on in order to prepare his products for the market. That might be considered a stage or a state of manufacture. Generally any processing by which the raw product is stepped up into a finished product is considered a stage of manufacture.

Mr. BORAH. In any event the amendment excludes agriculture from the operations of the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. It excludes it entirely so far as such processing as is necessary for preparation of the article for its first sale in the market.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] a question. Some question has been raised with reference to biological and laboratory products. I take it that by virtue of the amendment which was adopted the other day they would be excluded from the operation of the bill?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct, and that is one of the reasons why the amendment was adopted.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossing and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BLACK. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONNALLY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CUTTING (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] has a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] has a pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]. If the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] were present, he would vote "nay." If the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] were present, he would vote "yea."

I further desire to announce that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent on account of illness, that the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] is necessarily absent, and that the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is detained on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], and the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. BYRD. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 30, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BONE subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to state that at the time the vote was taken on the so-called "Black bill", providing for a 6-hour day, I was unavoidably absent from the Chamber. Had I been present and permitted to vote, I would have voted "yea."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendments to the preamble.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the preamble on page 2, line 1, the committee proposes to strike out "clogged the arteries of interstate and foreign commerce, and so burdened" and insert the words "brought about conditions injuriously affecting", so as to make the paragraph read:

Whereas the emergency has brought about conditions injuriously affecting the trade between the peoples of the various States that business is stagnant, unemployment, undernourishment, destitution, and want have been steadily increasing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment to the preamble was in the second paragraph, on page 2, after the word "commerce", to strike out the word "between" and insert the word "among"; and in the same line, after the word "the", to strike out the word "State" and insert the words "several States", so as to read:

Whereas while millions of citizens, ready and able to work, cannot secure the opportunity to do so, while millions of others are working in factories and industrial establishments 10, 12, 13, 14, and even 16 hours per day, producing goods shipped and used in interstate commerce, to the detriment of the whole people of the United States, and thereby burdening, injuring, and destructively affecting commerce among the people of the several States, and with foreign nations: Now, therefore—

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble, as amended, was agreed to.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3835, which is known as the "farm relief bill."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

THE CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

RELIEF OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume the Senator from South Carolina does not intend to proceed to the consideration of the agricultural relief bill at this late hour in the afternoon, so I ask if he will consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business in order that I may ask that the Senate consider at this time Senate bill 1094?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I understand that it is an emergency measure, and therefore, as the hour is late and the probabilities are that the consideration of the bill can be concluded this evening, I see no reason why the unfinished business may not be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the bill other than from statements made to me by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. I am wondering if the Senator from Florida will not be willing to make his motion in the morning, following the roll call, after the meeting of the Senate at 12 o'clock noon?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to conform to the wishes of the Senator from Oregon, but the bill was reported several days ago and has been on the calendar and before the Senate.

Mr. MCNARY. In the case of this bill, as of other bills on the calendar, when the statement is made that it will be brought up for consideration, no one pays any attention to it. I think that, with the notice that the Senator will call the bill up tomorrow, those who are not familiar with it will read it tonight and those who opposed it in the committee will be here by reason of the notice given, and, therefore, by waiting until tomorrow we will not unduly defer action on the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is agreeable to me if the Senator from South Carolina is willing. He consented, however, that the unfinished business should be laid aside.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not feel that we should lay aside the very important farm relief bill if the interposition of the bill of the Senator from Florida will lead to lengthy discussion, and, therefore, I object to laying temporarily aside the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that the Senator from Oregon merely requested that the suggestion of the Senator from Florida go over until the morning. I do not understand that he has objected finally to laying aside the unfinished business for a short time in order to consider the bill of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MCNARY. I tried to make it clear that on account of the lateness of the hour and the lack of notice the bill should go over until tomorrow at 12 o'clock. When the Senator from Florida renews his motion at that time I shall make no objection, and I think the Senator from South Carolina will be willing then temporarily to lay aside the farm relief bill so that the bill of the Senator from Florida may be considered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the bill provides for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stocks, bonds, and debentures of insurance companies, I shall certainly object to laying any other bill aside for it, because it will involve a good deal of discussion. I put in the RECORD today, I may say to the Senator from Arkansas, a statement showing the enormous salaries which are being paid to executive officers of insurance companies even during the depression; and I will not agree to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well, there is no effort to secure such an agreement now. I was merely making a statement explanatory of the situation as its affects the bill of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that an amendment to the bill provides that there shall be taken no preferred stock of insurance companies any officer, employee, agent, or anybody else connected with which receives in excess of $17,500 a year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There may be no objection to considering the bill tomorrow but I should like to examine it tonight.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

BUSINESS UPTURN

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Post of this morning entitled "One Hundred Business Leaders Sign Program to Start Upturn."

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 6, 1933]

ONE HUNDRED BUSINESS LEADERS SIGN PROGRAM TO START UPTURN

NEW YORK, April 5.—A 5-point inflation plan, which its exponents believe would "restart industry and give rapidly increasing employment," was outlined tonight by "The Committee for the Nation to Rebuild Prices and Purchasing Power."

The program is called "The Next Five Steps".

It is signed by 5 members of the "directing committee", and also by 100 prominent business leaders, industrialists and economists.

The "five steps", in brief, are:

"1. Recognize that bank deposits constitute the Nation's important medium of exchange. Therefore, the reopening of the maximum number of banks must be expedited and deposits unfrozen as rapidly as possible by a very broad and liberal use of the powers granted the administration by recent emergency legislation. In the opinion of the committee, the Government would be justified in expanding currency to protect the depositors of banks which have not yet reopened. * * * The Government should guarantee the deposits of all banks which have been reopened and which have been declared sound. * * *

"2. Continue embargo on gold export and suspension of specie payment before the United States returns to the gold standard; conferences should be held with Great Britain with the aim of making arrangements for these two countries to return to the gold basis simultaneously and on a basis that will give each country the price level it desires. * * *

"3. Remove restrictions upon foreign-exchange dealings which do not involve export of gold. Discontinue the efforts to keep the dollar at its former gold parity. The British pound sterling and other foreign exchanges must advance in the price level in the United States. By pegging the dollar in foreign exchange, we have held down our price level as completely as though we had not suspended gold payments. We must resume the free dealing in sterling and other foreign exchange. If this does not suffice, the United States should sell dollar exchange to depress the price so that foreign countries can acquire it at lower cost to pay their debts to us and to use it in buying goods from American agriculture and industry * * *.

"4. It should be announced forthwith that prior to lifting the embargo on gold at a future date, it will be the policy of the United States to revalue gold. It is the opinion of the committee that in this revaluation, the United States Treasury should raise the price of gold from $20.67 per ounce to a new price of $36.17 per ounce. This is an increase of 75 percent—an arbitrary temporary level, estimated to bring the commodity price level to a 1926 base. * * *

"5. A Federal nonpartisan board should be created to stabilize the United States general price level of wholesale commodity prices at 100. This is the average of the United States Bureau of Labor price levels from 1921 to 1930. * * *"

The committee says that if this program were adopted it would "have as its object the immediate increase of prices and a continuing increase that will gradually carry prices back to where they were in 1926."

In discussing suggestion no. 4, the report said:

"The mere knowledge that such a program of establishing a higher dollar price for gold is planned would start the price level upward.

"Such basic commodities as cotton, wheat, hides, and copper would rise rapidly. This price increase would quickly spread to other products.

"Consumers would begin to buy, dealers and wholesalers would buy from manufacturers, and industry would be set in motion. * * *

"World commodities would continue to exchange for practically the same amount of gold as previously, but each ounce would represent a larger number of dollars in the United States.

"At this point a new stabilization board would operate to maintain the then existing price level within a narrow range of fluctuation."

The report said that in February the committee "forecast, among other things, the impending need for (a) embargo of gold exports, and (b) suspension of specie payments as a prerequisite to restoration of price levels within the United States, and these two steps are now accomplished facts."

The signers are Lessing J. Rosenwald, chairman Sears, Roebuck & Co.; F. H. Sexhauer, president Dairymen's League Cooperative Association; F. H. Frazier, chairman General Baking Co.; Vincent Bendix, president Bendix Aviation Co.; and J. H. Rand, president Remington Rand Co., as members of the directing committee.

Among the 100 other signers are: Philip K. Wrigley, president William Wrigley, Jr., Co.; L. J. Taber, master National Grange; Irving Fisher, Yale economist; F. C. Williams, investment banker; E. L. Cord, president Cord Corporation.

THE EMERGENCY FARM BILL AND NATIONAL PROSPERITY

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] on April 3 on the subject of the emergency farm bill and national prosperity.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For more than 10 years the balance of trade has been against the farmers and the agricultural areas of the country. That disadvantage becomes apparent when it is pointed out that the price level of farm commodities is only 50 percent of the pre-war level, while the prices paid by farmers for industrial commodities is 102 percent of the pre-war level.

Since 1928 the prices of things the farmer sells have dropped an average of 60 percent, but things he buys have dropped only 29 percent. Forty-two percent of all farms were mortgaged in 1930 for a total of $9,241,000,000—which is almost three times the pre-war debt level. During the past decade, from one sixth to one eighth of all farms in the United States have been foreclosed or sold at forced sales. Farm taxes are 2½ times the pre-war level. In scores of communities in more than 20 States organized groups of farmers have taken the law into their own hands and forcibly resisted legal procedure in mortgage foreclosures.

It is no wonder that so many of our factories and industries are closed, trade is paralyzed, and approximately 11,000,000 people are unemployed in the cities and towns. The destruction of the purchasing power of agriculture has curtailed the principal market for the products of industry.

First, the purchasing power of the 30,000,000 people living on the farms of this country dried up. This, in turn, caused the purchasing power of the 22,000,000 people residing in the villages and towns adjacent to these farms to almost vanish, and when the purchasing power of 52,000,000 of our people, practically one half of our population, dwindled to such small proportion, it was inevitable that the disastrous consequences would reach into the great cities and industrial centers, closing factories, stagnating trade, throwing millions out of work, and curtailing the wages of others. This reduction in the purchasing power of labor still further reduced the market for the goods of industry and agriculture, thus intensifying still more the disastrous consequences of the loss of farm buying power.

Such in brief outline are the conditions with which we are confronted. Surely no one can deny that we are facing an acute emergency which requires speedy and effective action.

The farm bill is frankly an emergency measure designed to deal with this acute situation. In ordinary times I would be hesitant to apply such far-reaching measures, but the condition of agriculture and the country generally is such that I am convinced of the imperative necessity of acting speedily and effectively and, if necessary, in a drastic way to meet this emergency which threatens our whole economic structure and, indeed, endangers the safety of our political institutions.

I do not agree with the philosophy that we can do nothing by legislation to cure the farmers' troubles. Much of his trouble has been occasioned by discriminatory legislation, and there is no reason why we should not remedy these troubles by legislation. For a great many years the producers of our great basic farm crops, such as cotton, wheat, corn, oats, hog products, rice, and tobacco, have been buying manufactured goods at prices raised artifically by high tariffs, while they have sold their commodities on virtually a free-trade basis, because the pressure of the exportable surplus tended to depress domestic prices down to the level of world prices, even on the farm commodities on which we had tariffs. To give just another example of legislative favoritism, the railroads, through authority granted by Congress to the Interstate Commerce Commission, have established a high level of freight rates in an attempt to assure the railroads a profit on a greatly exaggerated investment, while farmers and other groups are producing at terrific losses today. Freight rates on farm products are roughly 50 percent higher than before the war, while farm prices are just one half the pre-war level; yet the railroads thus far have successfully resisted any adequate reductions in freight rates.

The emergency farm bill confers broad powers upon the Secretary of Agriculture to cope with the existing emergency. It recognizes that no one plan can be applied rigidly to every commodity, nor can it be applied unchanged even to one commodity continuously. There must be flexibility in order to give ample power to deal with the particular marketing problems of each commodity under varying conditions.

The declared purpose of the pending bill is to reestablish prices to farmers to an extent that will enable them to buy the same amount of industrial commodities with the same amount of farm commodities that exchanged for each other in the pre-war period of 1909–14.

To accomplish this purpose the Secretary of Agriculture is empowered to:

(1) Provide for reduction in acreage or production of specified farm products and to compensate producers for such reduction through rental or benefit payments.

(2) Enter into marketing agreements with producers, marketing agencies, and processors of farm products.

(3) License processors and distributing agencies engaged in interstate or foreign commerce in handling agricultural products and to regulate them so as to eliminate unfair practices and charges.

(4) Use the Smith cotton option contract plan on the 1933 crop of cotton.

(5) Impose taxes on the processing of the basic agricultural commodities at an amount not in excess of that necessary to restore the pre-war price parity, subject to the limitation that the tax shall be reduced if the full amount is more than can be borne under existing conditions without excessive reduction in consumption.

It is intended under this broad grant of power that the Secretary will call in representatives of the producers and processors for each commodity and shall work out separately for each commodity the method of dealing with it which offers the best hope of effective control of production for the 1933 crops and of progressive action toward an elimination of surplus stocks or production, and restoration of normal price parities.

Power is granted to make effective the law of supply and demand by reduction of excessive surpluses so that prices growing out of an effective demand will not be driven down by dumping on the market quantities for which there is no buying power.

Under the power to levy a tax on processors provision is made for hearings to interested parties, so that in each step of the application of the law the Secretary will discuss the proposed steps with those interested and will take into account their expert advice.

In controlling production of different commodities different systems will probably be used. Thus it is anticipated that in the case of hogs and corn the payment of rent for retirement of corn land from production will be contingent upon a corresponding reduction in the quantity of hogs marketed by the producer. In the case of cash crops, the rental or benefit payment may be based primarily upon reduction in acreage of the particular crop in question, with supplementary provisions as to the alternative use of the land. Under the plan the Secretary is also at liberty to rent land in large tracts or in selected regions or to allot the sums for land rentals by States and counties, so that each producer will have an equal opportunity to rent a portion of his land and to receive rental payments.

The main advantages of this plan may be summarized as follows:

First. It provides an effective plan of voluntary reduction of production to conform to consumptive demands, without applying compulsion to farmers, and at the same time compensates the farmers for not planting a part of their lands.

Second. It provides for the gradual but rapid attainment of pre-war purchasing power in home markets for producers of the great basic farm crops, which, in the main, do not benefit from the protective tariff.

Third. This result is achieved without any Government subsidy; the plan is self-supporting.

Fourth. It does not attempt to fix prices by Government fiat; price levels will still be determined by supply and demand, but when these prices are insufficient to give farmers price parity they also receive sufficient benefits to give them price parity. These benefits do not come out of general taxes.

Fifth. No great administrative force is needed. It is planned to utilize the agricultural extension service, farm organizations, cooperative associations, and other existing agencies wherever practicable.

Sixth. Through the licensing feature both the producer and the consumer are to be protected against unfair practices, profiteering, and other attempts of processors and handlers to defeat the plan.

Seventh. It gives all agencies involved a voice in its administration by means of the marketing agreements which are authorized.

Eighth. It creates a favorable domestic market for our farm products—equivalent in effect to protective tariff benefits—without inviting foreign retaliation.

Ninth. It does not discourage exports; commodities and manufactured products will move in export just as they do now, free from any tax.

Tenth. The broad, flexible powers granted the Secretary permit him to apply different methods to suit the needs of each commodity and varying conditions.

Obviously it will require a reasonable amount of time to get the bill into full operation, but we are hopeful of getting it started so it will apply to this year's crop if Congress will pass it soon enough.

What about consumers? How would they fare under the bill?

Much inflammatory criticism has been circulated about the bill, mainly by a few processing interests, in an attempt to alarm the consuming public against the measure.

There does not seem to me to be any justification for alarm on the part of consumers.

Take the case of wheat prices and bread prices. It is well known that bread prices change very little while wheat prices fluctuate very greatly. An investigation of this matter by a subcommittee of the Senate Agricultural Committee disclosed that from 1923 to 1924 the farm price of wheat advanced 12 cents per bushel while bread prices advanced only one tenth of 1 cent per pound; from 1923 to 1925 the farm price of wheat advanced 52.5 cents, but bread prices went up only seven tenths of 1 cent per pound. From 1925 to 1930 farm wheat prices went down 70.1 cents per bushel but bread prices declined only seven tenths of 1 cent. The farmer gets less than 1 cent for the wheat in a loaf of bread.

The fact is distribution costs in this country are too high. As a result the farmer gets too little and the consumer pays too much. This is not entirely due to the processors or distributors alone but is due partly to our costly and wasteful distribution system. Farmers receive just half what they received before the war, but the cost of distribution of food products is 54 percent higher than the pre-war level. In March 1933, farmers received 63.4 percent less for wheat than the pre-war average but consumers paid 14.3 percent more than the pre-war average. Beef-cattle producers received 36.3 percent less than the pre-war average but consumers paid 13.8 percent more for sirloin steak. Cotton farmers received 55.6 percent less for cotton than the pre-war average while the wholesale price of textile goods was only 9.4 percent lower. Hog producers received 59.4 percent less than the pre-war average while sliced ham was 7 percent higher and pork chops were 22 percent lower. Farmers received 19.5 percent less for lambs but consumers paid 14.8 percent more for lamb.

Distribution costs here are much higher than in other countries. In 1932 wheat sold for $1.71 per bushel in Paris, compared to 46.9 cents at Kansas City, yet bread prices in the United States were nearly twice what they were in Paris, averaging 6.7 cents at Kansas City, compared to 3.9 cents at Paris. Compared with the pre-war period, the Kansas City price for wheat dropped from 95 cents pre-war to 46.9 cents in 1932, while bread prices increased from 6 cents pre-war to 6.7 cents in 1932. The reverse was true in Paris; wheat prices increased from $1.41 per bushel in pre-war to $1.71 in 1932, while bread prices decreased from 5.5 cents to 3.9 cents.

Consumers, wage earners, and the country generally will profit from the operations of this measure through the revival of business and trade which it will start. The restoration of the pre-war purchasing power of these basic commodities will restore a lost market for the products of the mines and factories and for the services of the people in the cities and industrial centers.

Few people realize the vastness of this lost buying power of 52 million people dependent upon agriculture. In the March issue of the Country Gentleman Harry O'Brien tells of a 2,000-mile trip through the Corn Belt in an attempt to measure the possible extent of this market. He reports that he found a deferred buying power of almost unbelievable proportions—"a market big enough to restore national prosperity." One State alone needed $200,000,000 worth of materials for repairs to farm buildings alone, not to mention a host of other things. In the 2,000 miles traveled he did not find a single man who did not need to buy something.

He estimated this deferred buying needs would amount to billions of dollars, just waiting for increased purchasing power—billions of dollars for paint, lumber, autos, trucks, farm machinery, household appliances, furniture, clothing, radios, tools, magazines and newspapers, rugs and linoleum, life insurance, fire insurance, and a host of other things.

As President Roosevelt said in his message to Congress, the bill represents "a new and untrod path." But with equal frankness, he promised that if it failed to work, he would be the first to acknowledge it and inform the Congress. Can anything be fairer than that? Surely, we should permit him to carry out his program. Personally I am not one of those persons who are unwilling to do anything that is new—who want to maintain the status quo at any cost. The people are sick of the status quo. They want something new besides ruinous prices, unemployment, starvation wages, loss of homes, and destitution. They said so very emphatically last November. The administration has a mandate from the people to build a new and better order. The country understood clearly what our President proposed to do for agriculture and the Nation, because he outlined his program clearly and repeated its salient features again and again. The President is now engaged in carrying out his solemn pledges. Within a week after he took the oath of office, Secretary Wallace called together the farm leaders, and they formulated and agreed upon a set of principles which were incorporated into the farm bill which President Roosevelt forwarded to Congress 6 days later and which is now before the Senate.

This measure is the fulfillment of his promise to the American farmers and to the American people to revive trade and commerce by restoring farm purchasing power. The President has acted swiftly to fulfill his platform pledges. Commenting on this, the New York Journal of Commerce in the March 31 issue said: "President Roosevelt is revealed as following closely the Democratic pledges in the drafting of his economic program. He will go down in history as the first Chief Executive who respected these campaign promises by making an earnest effort to see that each plank is transformed into legislative action."

During the World War we resorted to much more drastic measures in order to win the war. We resorted to Government price fixing; to the conscription of our citizens to fight, and, if necessary, to give their lives; Government regulation of the profits of industry; the rationing of sugar, bread, and other necessities of life, and many other drastic and far-reaching proposals. The country generally accepted these unusual measures in the spirit of patriotism and national sacrifice in order to win the war.

We are now engaged in a war against the depression. Except for the loss of human life, I am not sure but that there is much more at stake for human happiness in the present war against the depression than there was involved in the World War; and, so far as the United States is concerned, I suspect that if accurate statistics were available of the number of suicides and the amount of illness and impairment of health attributable to this depression were available, they might show a greater loss of life and greater human suffering than we suffered during our participation in the World War.

In this grave hour of national emergency I think it is the duty of every citizen to lay aside all partisan and selfish considerations and rally to the support of our President in his war against the depression.

I appeal to every citizen to support our chosen leader to the end that he may make a reality the new deal which he has promised for American agriculture and the Nation.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On behalf of the majority, I ask that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] be assigned to the vacancy on the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] be excused from further service as a member of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, and that the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] be assigned to that Board in his place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a nomination, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and appears at the end of today's Senate proceedings.

DIRECTOR OF THE CENSUS—WILLIAM L. AUSTIN

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. STEPHENS. From the Committee on Commerce, I report favorably the nomination of William L. Austin, of Mississippi, to be Director of the Census. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and without objection the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the confirmation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order. The clerk will state the first nomination on the calendar.

GOVERNOR, PANAMA CANAL

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Julian L. Schley to be Governor of the Panama Canal.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] in the Chamber. A day or two ago he asked that this nomination go over. I shall ask that it go over once more in order to afford the Senator from Utah the opportunity of taking any course in the matter he may choose to take.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed over.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before this nomination goes over I should like to say that I talked with the Senator from Utah, and I question whether he will insist upon the objection. He stated to me that his objection did not go to the appointee at all but to the practice of selecting military officers as governors of the Canal Zone.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is my understanding of his attitude.

Mr. GEORGE. I am willing to have it go over one more time, but I should like to have it disposed of at the next executive session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it should be disposed of at the next executive session.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Rexford Guy Tugwell, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, be gracious and bridge the chasm that separates us from communion with Thee. We turn in prayer to the throne room of the universe. Thou, who art touched with a feeling of our infirmities and yield to the feeblest cry of little children, accept our offering. O may our dreams and visions open a world of happy usefulness in the service of the people. Persuade us, blessed Lord, that in the sweep of time, success is the sweet, patient waiting for the will of God. Let hope revive beneath the dismal skies of our country and courageous faith discern the coming of better and brighter days. In the name of the Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, let us see what the program is going to be. I will leave that to the majority leader.

Mr. BYRNS. To settle that, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next. I do that for the reason that I am informed that the committees having bills under consideration and conducting hearings will not be ready to do more than to make a report between now and Monday, and it would be impossible to consider them between now and Monday.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman from Tennessee will yield, what about the investigation by the Judiciary Committee of the Treadway resolution?

Mr. BYRNS. As I understand, the Judiciary Committee appointed a subcommittee to consider it, and the subcommittee was to make a report at 10 o'clock this morning. The gentleman from Tennessee is here, and perhaps he can give the information.

Mr. BROWNING. Unfortunately, I was obliged to be absent from the hearing this morning and could not give the gentleman the information. I do not know what final action was taken this morning.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, will the majority leader tell us, if the Judiciary Committee decides that the bill is not subject to a constitutional objection, is it intended to take up on Monday the Wagner bill?

Mr. BYRNS. It would be my idea, unless it was by agreement temporarily laid aside until a copy of the Wagner bill was reported from the committee.

Mr. SNELL. An exactly identical bill was introduced in the House and referred by the Speaker.

Mr. BYRNS. It seems to me that regardless of the report of the Judiciary Committee, if the farm mortgage bill and securities bill were ready for consideration Monday, the other bill could be withheld.

Mr. SNELL. It will not delay the program, whichever way the Judiciary Committee decides.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But to take up the Senate bill would save a little time, instead of starting at the other end and considering the House bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the House should dispose of the Treadway resolution before we consider either the Senate or the House bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Surely; but I mean if the Treadway resolution is held not defective by the Judiciary Committee, is it the intention to take the Wagner bill from the Speaker's table and consider it?

Mr. BYRNS. That will depend on the action of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is another matter, if the gentleman will yield. In the event that the Judiciary Committee—and I am making a guess, for I do not know what that committee will hold—if the committee holds that it is a revenue measure, then it seems to me the bill instead of going to the Banking and Currency Committee would have to go to the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SNELL. I want to say that the basis of my objection was not as to which committee should have charge of it but a question of a revenue measure, which should originate in the House of Representatives. It was not with reference to which committee should have charge of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman, then, would raise no point upon the matter of its reference?

Mr. SNELL. No; because that has nothing to do with the constitutional question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, under the rules providing for what the Committee on Ways and Means has jurisdiction of, the bill would probably have to go to that committee, because, as I understand it, the rules provide that that committee has jurisdiction over bonded indebtedness.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will look back at the history of that legislation, he will see that some of it has come from the Banking and Currency Committee and some from the Committee on Ways and Means. It is largely up to the Speaker of this House, and I think whatever committee he refers the bill to would be accepted by the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I fully agree with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has said. I took the matter up and presented the resolution from the viewpoint that the additional authorization for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its additional capitalization came from the Committee on Ways and Means. The Ways and Means Committee handled what was known at the time as the "Garner bill." The Speaker will recall that the Ways and Means Committee had that bill; and I assumed, and introduced my resolution with that in mind, that this further additional authorization would naturally bring about a Ways and Means reference.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman knows that the original bill came from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is no question about that.

Mr. McFADDEN. My recollection is that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was handled by the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. SNELL. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Garner bill, which has been referred to, contained a direct tax. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next?

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object merely for the purpose of securing for the RECORD a statement from the majority leader that no good purpose would be served by remaining in session so far as advancing this important legislation is concerned.

Mr. BYRNS. None whatever, because the committees are not yet ready to report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO FILE REPORT ON H.R. 4590

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in view of the action just taken, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture have the privilege any day this week to file a report upon the bill (H.R. 4590), together with the minority views.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I reserve the right to object, in order to make it clear that any member of the committee has the privilege of filing minority views if he differs from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JONES. That is to be understood.

Mr. BLANTON. With the understanding that all reports be printed in the same document.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that he have the remainder of the week in which to file a report upon the bill in question, minority views, if any, to be included at the same time?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. The question now comes on the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER] to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to that unanimous consent, although I do not intend to do so. I want it understood that there is to be no further business brought before the House today. Of course, if the majority leader wants to keep people here to allow someone to talk, that is quite satisfactory to me, but it should be understood that no other business is to be brought up. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRNS. There will be no other business. As far as I am concerned, if gentlemen want to talk and others want to remain here to listen to them, I shall have no objection.

Mr. SNELL. I shall have no objection to that, but I want it understood that if one has something else to do he can do it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that he be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, for the past 2 years or longer, Dr. Charles Holmes Herty, a noted scientist who was born in Milledgeville, Ga., the home of the dean of the Georgia delegation in the House of Representatives, the Honorable CARL VINSON, has been experimenting in the production of paper from Georgia pines. The people of my State have been greatly concerned as to what degree of success Dr. Herty might achieve in this important undertaking.

It is with great pride that I am able at this time to state to the Congress that Dr. Herty has been able to produce a very fine grade of paper from slash-pine trees in the congressional district of Georgia that I have the honor to represent in this body.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Soperton News, a weekly newspaper published at Soperton, Ga., in Treutlen County, one of the counties of the First District of Georgia, on Friday, March 31, 1933. This edition of the Soperton News is the first newspaper ever to be printed on paper made from pine trees. The slash-pine trees from which the paper used in this issue of the Soperton News was made were grown in Treutlen County, Ga. The paper itself was made by Dr. Herty, in his Georgia paper laboratory at Savannah, Ga., the outstanding city of my congressional district.

I am of the opinion that the success achieved by Dr. Herty in this matter is worthy of note and that the people, not only of Georgia but of the entire United States, will be greatly interested in knowing of Dr. Herty's scientific accomplishments.

The members of the newspaper fraternity throughout the country, in all probability, will be interested in knowing that the editor and publisher of the Soperton News is Mr. H. M. Flanders, one of my constituents. His interest in this matter and the splendid cooperation that he has given to Dr. Herty and others who have worked so diligently to bring about the desired results from the experiments that I have referred to are worthy of note, and I am sure Mr. Flanders should receive a portion of the commendation that all interested parties are entitled to in the premises.

I might add in passing that Mr. James Fowler, of Soperton, Ga., is the world's largest slash-pine grower. Mr. Fowler has planted, since 1926, 1,500,000 slash-pine seedlings. These trees were planted on land where there were no seed trees for natural seeding and on lands on which he had formerly grown corn and cotton at a loss. Mr. Fowler is the largest individual landowner in Treutlen County. He has 7,000 acres of forest lands, with a good stand of slash-pine timber, and by 1935 he expects to begin using for turpentine purposes several hundred acres of his planted trees. By so doing he can increase his turpentine operations from his present 20 crops to 40 crops, with an unlimited amount of timber available for an indefinite period. I am told that slash-pine trees are available for making newsprint after they reach the age of 7 years. Mr. Fowler states to the people of Georgia that it pays to grow and protect young trees.

Mr. J. E. Parker, Jr., who is secretary-treasurer of the Long County T.P.O., has thinned 1,300 acres of young slash timber during the last 6 weeks. Long County is also one of the counties represented by me in the Congress of the United States. Some of the timber thinned is very young, not over 3 years old, and brush hooks were used, which made the cost of the thinning operation quite low. Timber which averaged about 10 years old was thinned to a 10 by 10 spacing, and will now stand for 4 more years before another thinning will be necessary. The cost of thinning in 10-year-old slash pine, according to Mr. Parker, is only $1 per acre. The Parker-Howard Turpentine Co. has a perfect stand of young slash pines on 9,000 acres of land at this time.

I feel justified at this time in asking unanimous consent of the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therewith a very short editorial from the Soperton News of Friday, March 31, 1933, describing the pine trees from which the paper was made on which the newspaper that I hold in my hand was printed, also a short news story with reference to this matter printed in the Macon Telegraph on April 4, 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

[From the Soperton News, Friday, Mar. 31, 1933]

NEWSPAPER MADE FROM PINE TREES

You are now reading the first newspaper ever printed on newsprint made from pine trees. This newsprint was made at the Georgia experimental pulp and paper plant at Savannah from pine trees grown by Mr. James Fowler, of Soperton.

The slash pine trees from which this paper was made were planted in 1926 and when cut a few days ago averaged 12 feet in length cut off at top 4 inches in diameter and averaged 7 inches in diameter 1 foot from the ground. The trees averaged 110 pounds each, growing 440 pines to the acre, which will make 48,400 pounds, or a little over 24 tons of pulpwood per acre in a period of 7 years.

Dr. C. H. Herty, noted chemist, has been experimenting with pine trees for making newsprint for several years and has at last reached a stage of perfection in his research work as is evidenced by the paper before your eyes.

This issue of the News is dedicated to more and better forestry for Treutlen County, for the State of Georgia, and for the United States.

We are deeply indebted to Dr. C. H. Herty, of Savannah; Mr. Jack Thurmond, district forester, of Savannah; and Mr. James Fowler, together with others, who have contributed toward making this issue of the News what it is.

The Georgia farmer is destined to come into his own through reforestation if he only has the vision to make the best of the opportunities that are before him in growing pine trees. The newsprint industry will continue to grow, and the time is not far distant when papers will be using newsprint made from Georgia pines.

Utilize every available acre on your farms for growing pine trees. A farmer can make no better investment.

Farmers should use every precaution to keep fires out of their forest lands. Fires do untold damage to young trees, and millions of dollars damage is done yearly through careless fires.

The wise farmer will not burn his woods, for in doing so he is burning real profits.

[From the Macon Telegraph, Apr. 4, 1933]

PINE-TREE PAPER USED FOR EDITION OF SOPERTON NEWS

SAVANNAH, GA., April 3.—Dr. Charles H. Herty's dream has come to pass—they have printed a newspaper on paper made of Georgia pine pulp.

The Soperton (Ga.) News claims the distinction of being first to issue an edition with the newsprint produced by the Georgia paper laboratory in Savannah where Dr. Herty, famous American scientist, has been making experiments for months.

Printers said the paper "took the ink" as well as other newsprint and some said "it showed up a little better." Copies were sent President Roosevelt because of his interest in forestry.

The pulp was made from slash-pine trees only 7 years old which were grown by James Fowler, of Soperton.

The laboratory is continuing experiments despite Governor Talmadge's recent veto of a $20,000 appropriation by the Georgia Legislature. Leading newsprint manufacturers of the United States and Canada are due to come here next month to inspect the plant.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I suggest to the gentleman that since that is the first newspaper to be printed on paper made from pine timber, the paper ought to go to the proper place for preservation. I suggest the Library of Congress as the proper place.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a good one. I shall be glad to pass the paper around and let the Membership of the House see it, and I also should be glad to have it preserved. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion; and I hope the paper can be preserved, for its historical value, in the Library of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

EXPENDITURES IN THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged resolution (H.Res. 98) for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 98

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of H.Res. 59, and all points of order against said resolution shall be considered as waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the resolution and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution to its adoption or rejection.

INTEREST ON THE PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the address delivered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER] on yesterday with reference to the raising of the price levels. At that time I sought recognition, because what I am going to say today is along the line of economy and reducing our interest charge in conformity with the present price levels.

Since the 9th day of March when the Congress was called into special session by President Roosevelt, we have enacted into law some of the most constructive and far-reaching bills for the purpose of economizing in governmental expenses and balancing the Budget. It is hardly believable that so much economy could be achieved in so short a space of time. The rules and regulations governing salary reductions for Government workers and for reduction and elimination of veterans' benefits totaling more than $600,000,000 has been agreed upon and published to the world. Whether we like it or not, whether it takes benefits from our constituents or whether it takes away Government functions or not, has played no part in the action of Congress. The Members of the House and Senate have been bold and patriotic in their support thus far of the President's program. Those whose salaries were diminished, the veterans and veteran organizations whose benefits have been reduced or eliminated, have until this present hour cooperated patriotically in support of the President's program in balancing the Budget. There has never been a day in peace time that the American people have cooperated so courageously as they have in the present crisis, which surpasses almost the patriotism of war. I wish to congratulate the people of the country upon the splendid response they have made to the President's call for action. No President since Washington has exerted more influence on the people than that champion of progressive principles, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another part of the Budget where huge savings and economies can be effected. So far to date those in charge of the economy program and the newspapers of the country have not mentioned that feature of the Budget. I rise today to call attention to one of the largest items left in the Federal Budget—one for the present moment that seems to have been forgotten. We have heard a great deal about the three fourths to one billion dollars paid to the veterans. The National Economy League has proclaimed Veterans' Administration expenses to the four corners of the earth. I want to know now how the National Economy League and the public press of the country are going to accept a reduction in the item which I am about to mention—the interest charge on the public debt of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the interest on the public debt, varying in interest rates from about one third of 1 percent to 4¼ percent, amounts to about $700,000,000 annually. The largest item of this interest was made necessary by floating bonds to win the World War. It was incurred at the same time we mobilized 4,000,000 men and sent 2,000,000 of them to foreign shores, the same men whose benefits, gratuities, and pensions were reduced and taken away last week in the economy bill. Yea, we even conscripted those men to take them into that titanic struggle, but we did not conscript any wealth to win that war. There was plenty of profit in the bonds that were floated by the millions in every hamlet and township in the United States, but there was no profit to be made by the individual soldier who braved the dangers of exposure and combat in the front-line trenches.

Although we have economized by taking from those that labor and have labored, by taking from those who are disabled and will be disabled, we have not taken one solitary cent from the interest charges on the bonds that are now, 15 years after the war, held by a comparatively few people that own and control four fifths of the wealth of the Nation.

There has been considerable discussion in recent days about pre-war prices. You see the products of the farm and the wage scale in many places down to and even lower than pre-war days.

What was the rate of interest paid on Government bonds in pre-war times? Except a small issue of Panama consol bonds, bearing 3 percent, the interest on bonds was 2 percent.

If interest on Government bonds in pre-war days was sufficient at 2 percent, then in the crying hour of need in this crisis, for economy to balance the Budget, Congress is justified in reducing the interest on every bond held against the Federal Government to 2 percent. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a table showing the amount of bonds outstanding, the annual interest, and the savings that would be effected at the rate of 2 percent if the entire national debt were rewritten and refunded at this time, and I ask unanimous consent to include it in my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

Bonds	Amount outstanding	Annual interest	Savings at 2 percent	Loss at 2 percent
Consols and Panama Canal bonds	$753,320,130	$15,853,347	$786,945
Postal-savings bonds	43,453,360	1,086,334	217,768
First Liberty Loan	1,933,213,600	71,707,362	33,043,090
Fourth Liberty Loan	6,268,099,450	266,394,226	141,032,237
Treasury bonds	5,224,883,950	186,367,231	81,869,552
Treasury notes	3,074,531,600	87,648,634	28,600,348
Retirement bonds	224,244,000	8,969,760	4,484,880
Certificates of indebtedness	1,773,989,100	38,607,611	11,562,521
Treasury notes	1,025,503,000	14,380,927		$14,563,823
Total	20,321,238,190	691,015,432	301,597,341
Less loss at 2 percent			14,563,823
Net saving to Budget			287,033,518

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. In view of the fact that our short-term bonds, which were just recently sold and which ordinarily would carry a very much lower rate than the regular bonds, had to bear about 4 percent interest or a little more in order to be sold at all on the market, how does the gentleman feel that our regular bond issues could be marketed at par with a 2-percent interest charge? How could we compel people to buy them?

Mr. PARSONS. We would simply exchange new bonds for those which are outstanding at the present time. We have forced a reduction in every other occupation and profession and every other part of the Budget. Why are we not justified in forcing a reduction in the interest rate? The gentleman is mistaken about short-time loans bearing 4 percent. These loans only bear from 0.34 to a little over 1 percent.

Mr. HARLAN. I am not questioning the justice of it. I am questioning the feasibility of it. The people who now hold those bonds are entitled to the receipt of money when the bonds are retired. They cannot be compelled to take 2-percent bonds; and if the market would not justify the purchase of Government bonds at 2 percent at par, how could people be compelled to take them? I am in sympathy with the gentleman, but I am just asking the question as a practical proposition.

Mr. PARSONS. At the present price levels interest at 4¼ percent upon the fourth Liberty Loan bonds outstanding is equivalent now to almost 9 percent, at least 8 percent, compared with what pre-war prices were. There is no justification whatsoever why we should not have a reduction in the interest rates. Furthermore, Treasury notes are being sold every few months at rates ranging from 0.34 to 1.43 percent. The public will take the bonds.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Would the gentleman call upon all people who now own bonds to turn them in, or direct them to turn them in and take 2-percent bonds in their place?

Mr. PARSONS. I am willing to support such a measure and ask the patriotic cooperation of the holders of the bonds; and if they fail to respond, then use just a little pressure to put it over. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. But we have a Supreme Court in this country. How about the validity of contracts?

Mr. PARSONS. We will get to that in a minute.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am very anxious to see how that will be handled.

Mr. PARSONS. I will say to the gentleman in passing there would be no impairment to the capital structure. The principal of the bond remains the same, which is the contract between the Government and bondholder. We hire money, just as we do individuals. We would only be reducing the compensation for money, just as we reduce compensation for labor. It is identical in principle, except that human rights are, and of right ought to be, paramount to property rights.

If the entire Federal debt, amounting to almost $21,000,000,000, was refunded in the next 90 days at the rate of 2 percent, we would have a reduction in interest charges and a reduction in the Budget expenditures of $287,000,000.

I believe in economy, I believe in balancing the Budget, but I do not believe in taking all of these savings from one group. Congress has taken the wages of the Government worker; it has taken the pensions, gratuities, and benefits to veterans, their widows and orphans. We are about to, I am informed, cut deeper into the Budget on expenditures, all of which I am glad and willing to support; but, Mr. Speaker, those 75,000,000 people who are affected by these economies, who have cooperated so courageously with Congress and the President's program, will not be contented and happy and stand idly by while the few other millions of our population continue to draw excessive interest on the bonds they hold against the Federal Government.

To preserve civilization and the sacred traditions, which our forefathers handed down to us, the Nation has been willing to conscript human labor. Our people are willing today, as millions have been willing in the past, to dedicate their labor and lifeblood, if needs be, to the perpetuity of this Republic, not only in time of war, but in time of peace; but at the same time, Mr. Speaker, I am still more willing to conscript the wealth and the interest rates of the bondholders of this country to balance the Budget in a crisis like this.

Salary reductions effect economies to the amount of $175,000,000; reduction in veterans' benefits, $425,000,000. It is estimated $150,000,000 more will be saved by consolidation of the various bureaus in the Government. If we reduce interest $287,000,000, the total reduction of the Budget will be $1,037,000,000. This is a saving never dreamed of, even by the most ardent proponents of economy; but, Mr. Speaker, we cannot make these reductions as they have been made and expect the American people to continue to support the program unless $287,000,000 is accomlished in reduction of interest. If you say that 2 percent interest is not sufficient on tax-free Government bonds and that, if the cost of living goes up, we must necessarily raise the rate of interest, I say to you that for the next few years, at least, this rate can be established, thereby balancing the Budget and making sure the bonds will sell at par; and if in the future interest rates generally rise, refunding operations can be made accordingly with a higher rate of interest.

Arkansas the other day, owing $148,000,000 worth of road bonds, bearing a rate of interest of 5 and 5½ percent, refunded their debt on a basis of 3 percent and issued a warning to the holders thereof that no further interest would be paid upon the old bonds outstanding. Oh, you may argue, Mr. Speaker, that such action is an impairment of contract, that it is a defalcation in payment; but I submit that every dollar of pension and gratuity that was taken from the veterans, their widows and orphans, was an impairment of contract and defalcation in principle on the part of the Government, on the contract with veterans made by the laws passed by this Congress.

If the State of Arkansas through its legislature can reduce its interest on bonds to 3 percent, why under heaven cannot the Congress of the United States float the bonds of the Federal Government at 2 percent? Let us say to every holder of a Government bond that if you want to hold the present one and receive no interest, well and good; but if you surrender it in exchange for a bond bearing 2 percent, this Government will guarantee you 2 percent on the investment. I plead with the Membership of this House to give careful consideration to this proposal. I implore the President of the United States and those associated with him in this emergency to give just and earnest consideration to this matter before it is too late. By taking action now our entire debt can be rewritten to take effect on July 1, simultaneously with other economy measures.

I hold in my hand an article from the Washington Star of a few days ago with reference to 91-day Treasury bills of approximately $100,000,000 that were almost four times oversubscribed. While these were only 91-day Treasury bills, the rate of interest for one year is only ninety-nine one hundredths of 1 percent. Last December $100,000,000 of 90-day Treasury bills were floated for eighty-five one hundredths of 1 percent.

I read the article for your information:

91-DAY TREASURY BILLS ARE OVERSUBSCRIBED

The Treasury Department announced last night that subscriptions totaling $383,656,000 have been received for the $100,000,000 of 91-day Treasury bills, which will be sold tomorrow.

Secretary Woodin said the average price for the bills was 99.659, equivalent to a bank discount basis of about 1.35 percent. He said the total amount of bids accepted was $100,096,000.

The highest bid was 99.750, equivalent to an interest rate of about 0.99 percent on an annual basis, while the lowest bid accepted was 99.630, equivalent to an interest rate of about 1.46 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. These Treasury certificates were issued in December at a yearly interest rate of thirty-four one hundredths of 1 percent. Here is one individual, let us say, who furnished the Government $1,000 for $3.40 a year, or $100 for 34 cents a year; yet right beside him is the holder of a 4¼ percent Liberty loan bond of the Government who receives $42.50 for a $1,000 bond, or $4.25 for $100. There is no justification whatsoever for the inequality in interest rates paid, and there is no justification in continuing the interest rates at 3½ and 4¼ percent when money can be borrowed for thirty-four one hundredths of 1 percent a year.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. HART. Is the gentleman aware that the Government has loaned the farmers of the Nation $16,000,000,000 on a 10-year basis at one eighth of 1 percent?

Mr. PARSONS. I did not know of that fact, but I know the interest rates in many instances are extremely low.

Prior to the war, when prices were higher even than they are today, there was not a single outstanding Government bond, except a small issue floated in 1906 to complete the Panama Canal, that bore more than 2 percent annual interest.

Mr. HART. Does the gentleman also know that one subsidiary of the Farm Board has borrowed money at that rate and purchased Government bonds bearing 4 percent interest, and are making a profit out of the Government?

Mr. PARSONS. No doubt they can do that under the Farm Board Act. Such practices ought to be stopped. It is a subsidy to those who are in on the deal and cannot be defended.

Since the beginning of the special session we have been following the leadership of the President. It is time that Congress assume responsibility and make some economies of its own. The Ways and Means Committee is the proper one to report this kind of legislation. We are soon to float more bonds—probably several billion before the depression is over. Are we to continue to pay exorbitant rates of interest, or is Congress going to assert its power to bring about a reduction in interest? I hope the Ways and Means Committee will assert its right to report such a measure at an early date. It will have almost the unanimous support of the Membership of this House; and if we send such a measure to the White House, I earnestly believe the President will approve it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the delightful gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I just came into the Chamber and heard the gentleman mention the Ways and Means Committee. I am interested in knowing what is intended to be referred to it.

Mr. PARSONS. I have been addressing myself to the question of reducing the rate of interest on Government bonds, a matter that comes before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Has such a bill been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. PARSONS. None has been introduced.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Does the gentleman contemplate introducing such a measure?

Mr. PARSONS. I am asking the Ways and Means Committee to take the matter up and get busy with it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman has not introduced such a bill.

Mr. PARSONS. I have not; but if no member of the Committee on Ways and Means, whose duty it is to act first, introduces such a bill within the next 10 days, I expect to prepare one and ask the committee for action.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Can the gentleman inform the House the amount of savings that might be expected as the result of such legislation?

Mr. PARSONS. It would amount to something like $287,000,000 annually.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And the bonds will be refinanced at what rate of interest?

Mr. PARSONS. Two percent. Some of the issues outstanding are: One issue of consols and Panama consols bear 2 and 3 percent and serve as reserve for issue of national-bank currency. These would not be disturbed under this plan.

The postal savings pays 2½ percent. The first Liberty Loans vary from 3½ to 4¼ percent. The fourth Liberty Loan bears 4¼ percent. The Treasury bonds vary from 3 to 4¼ percent. Treasury notes bear from 2⅛ to 4 percent. The retirement bonds all bear 4 percent. This is another class of bonds, the interest rate on which could be reduced in this economy drive, the same as salaries and other gratuities have been reduced. Certificates of indebtedness, however, vary from three fourths of 1 percent to 3¾ percent; and the Treasury notes that have been floated in the last 18 months to the extent of over a billion dollars range in interest rates from thirty-four one hundredths of 1 percent to 1.4 percent.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Illinois think it requires legislation to refinance the present obligation? Cannot the Secretary of the Treasury refinance the Government obligations under existing law?

Mr. PARSONS. He can only refinance such issues as fall due on certain dates; but the Committee on Ways and Means could and should bring in a bill underwriting the entire national debt structure at this session of Congress and make every class of citizens bear its part of economy.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Has the gentleman consulted with the Secretary of the Treasury on the matter?

Mr. PARSONS. I have not. I am only trying to arouse sentiment in favor of the proposition so the Secretary and President may recognize the justice of such a measure and ask Congress to act. If they fail to do so, then it is up to Congress to act in its own capacity. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, the lamentable disaster which has befallen our country in the loss of the officers and crew of the Akron has wrung the hearts of all of us. We deeply deplore this tragedy. Many of us lost personal friends, and our Nation has been deprived of the services of skilled men who cannot be easily replaced.

Perhaps the first reaction of our minds to this disaster is a feeling of hostility toward the type of aircraft upon which these brave men perished.

I listened attentively yesterday to the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] with reference to his desire and purpose to introduce a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee of seven Members of the House to investigate this tragedy. Personally I have no objection to such investigation. I think an investigation should be made, but I think also that we should not hastily condemn the use of dirigibles, especially at a time when sentiment and emotion are so likely to dominate our thinking. We should not take precipitate action or be swayed by preconceived notions concerning the utility of such craft.

The resolution makes reference to the destruction of dirigibles in days gone by. It mentions particularly the Roma and the giant airship which buckled, exploded, and fell in England. Disasters due to causes which led to these catastrophes have not been duplicated in this country since we adopted the policy of using helium. We have had no further dirigible tragedies due to explosion.

Let us consider for a moment the utility of dirigibles. A great British admiral and naval authority has testified that 1 helium-filled dirigible as a naval vessel is worth from 3 to 5 battle cruisers. A battle cruiser, as I recall, costs about $10,000,000. Five of them would cost approximately $50,000,000 and three of them $30,000,000. With the equipment now available for the building and housing of dirigibles, an airship of the size of the Akron can be constructed for two or three million dollars. If the statement of this British authority be accurate, then in our program of national defense the dirigible is our most economical asset.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. So let us not be hasty and discard dirigibles without a full and fair consideration of their merits.

I dislike the harsh expression which sometimes finds its way into print that such tragedies as the Akron disaster, involving great loss of life, are the toll of progress, and yet in almost every line of endeavor this is true. We have often paid dearly for our advancement, but we have not discontinued other activities because of loss of life or material. The last utterance I heard from Admiral Moffett was over the radio. He was speaking of the value of lighter-than-air craft in our program and urging us to carry on.

Now, what have been the circumstances of the dirigible disasters in this country since we began our helium project? We have had two losses, the Shenandoah and the Akron. The Shenandoah, our first effort at the airship on a large scale, was destroyed in a storm which, from all reports, must have been similar in its intensity to that in which the Akron was lost. In my judgment, they both fell victims to cyclonic disturbances in the particular regions where they happened to be. My recollection is that in the case of the Shenandoah warnings had been given that the ship was advancing into a storm area. I do not mention this in disparagement of the brave men in control, for I recall that they did what seemed safest and best under the circumstances. The control cars of this first large dirigible were not an integral part of the framework of the ship itself but were suspended from it by struts. The breaking of these struts hurled these cars to the ground and the occupants were killed; but, despite the fact that the Shenandoah broke in two or three pieces, all the others of the crew made safe landings.

This tragedy taught us to attach the control cars to the framework of the ship as an integral part of it in order that such an accident might not be duplicated. I recall having read the statement of one of the many survivors of the Shenandoah. He was traveling home on a Pullman car and he said that if that car had been in the same storm with the Shenandoah it, too, would have been torn to pieces.

From the best information I can get, though information is necessarily somewhat meager until some investigation is made, the Akron also fell a victim to a cyclonic storm and in an area where such storms are prevalent. The statement can be easily verified that that particular locality is peculiarly subject to disturbances of somewhat similar character.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that if there are defects in the manner of construction of these dirigibles let them be remedied. If the models and plans are wrong, let them be corrected.

Our Nation is providentially blessed in being the only one which can put in the air dirigibles filled with a nonexplosive gas. Other nations not so fortunate in obviating the hazard of explosion are carrying on successfully in the lighter-than-air field. As an element of peace, of world security, the great value of helium-filled dirigibles properly constructed as scouting vessels for the Navy enables us to play an important part in promoting the cessation of wars, because through such craft our Nation has a peculiar means of offense and defense denied to the other countries of the world.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman ask for some additional time so that I may ask him a question?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman stated a moment ago that our battleships cost $10,000,000.

Mr. LANHAM. Battle cruisers, I said.

Mr. FOCHT. It is my recollection that the dreadnaught type of vessel costs from $20,000,000 up to a maximum point of $40,000,000.

Mr. LANHAM. That is my understanding also, but I used the term "battle cruisers", and I understand they are not so expensive.

Mr. FOCHT. I asked my friend here, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], and he is of the same opinion, and we both during the war voted for bills authorizing the construction of these ships, and we are of opinion that they cost the same.

Mr. LANHAM. May I inquire of the gentleman from New York as to the cost of construction of a battle cruiser?

Mr. FISH. The construction of a battle cruiser or a battleship over 10,000 tons is $20,000,000 and upward.

Mr. LANHAM. Then the point which I make is accentuated if the statement of the British admiral is correct that as a vessel at sea in time of war 1 helium-filled dirigible is worth from 3 to 5 battle cruisers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, and Members of the House. I may have a half dozen Members of the House agree with me or I may have half of the Members of the House agree with me, or I may have practically every Member of the House disagree with me. Therefore, whether you agree or disagree, my opinion, in the way I shall express it, will be right.

We have come to the point in the United States when men and women who have attained the age of 50 have great difficulty in securing work, no matter how many jobs are available.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN. Yes.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I want to say to the gentleman that in the city of Detroit, in the automobile industry, if a man or a woman has reached the age of 40 they will not employ him.

Mr. DUNN. I have not seen that statement in the papers.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. That is a fact, and they do not print those things in the newspapers.

Mr. DUNN. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I want to say that at the present time a resolution to that effect has been in Congress for a year and a half. I introduced in the House a resolution to accomplish the very thing the gentleman is talking about, and I trust the gentleman will help me get it through.

Mr. DUNN. I am very glad to learn that there is such a resolution. I want to call attention to the fact that men and women who are physically incapacitated, although not entirely, find it impossible to obtain any relief or work.

It is true, there are in the United States a variety of supposed charitable agencies, and men and women who are in need are compelled to humiliate themselves when they ask for aid from the said organizations.

In my opinion, the United States Government has lost hundreds of millions of dollars by not having old-age and disability pensions. I say this because there are hundreds of millions of dollars wasted by various charitable agencies where they take 75 percent of the money they collect for wages and overhead expenses.

I maintain if we had an old age and disability pension law, we could put a stop to these parasites who come around to our doors and tell us that they are collecting in behalf of humanity. Investigation after investigation has been made and it has been proved conclusively that many of these agencies put most of the money they collect in their pockets, and not in the pockets of the unfortunates for whom they claim it was collected. I hope that the United States of America will, in the very near future, bring about a condition whereby none of its citizens shall be compelled to humiliate themselves by appealing to any agency for food, shelter, and clothing.

Let us do away with the supposed charitable agencies and eradicate the abominable poorhouses. This can be done by giving an adequate pension to the aged and those who are physically incapacitated. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KELLER). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, on Monday last, April 3, 1933, the House was beguiled into passing the bill H.R. 4220, for the protection of Government records, and the fate of that bill a little while after its passage by the House should be a warning to the leadership of the House and to the executive branch of the Government that the chairmen of committees of the House not treat this House so casually again. It is important at this time that the relationship between the House and the executive branch of the Government should be most cordial, and that the understanding between the executive branch of the Government and the House should be on a firm foundation. This House is not a debating society and what we do here is not an academic proposition. What we do here has a tremendous bearing upon the lives and liberties and properties of American citizens. Therefore it is very important that in the rush of business before the special session, those charged with responsibility to the House be absolutely accurate in the information they give the House on which the House predicates its legislation.

The economy bill passed the House under great pressure, and under the belief that if it did not pass the House immediately upon its presentation the world would come to an end. Yet the Senate found that the House bill had to be clarified in about 30 different places, all of which made the House look more or less ridiculous as a legislative body. In other words, had there been no Senate, there would have been no bill, because the bill as it passed the House meant nothing.

As soon as the bill I refer to now, H.R. 4220, for the protection of Government records, passed the House, with only 29 Members voting against it, the chairman of the committee who urged the bill immediately went to the press gallery and stated that the bill had to be amended. Is that any way to treat the House? The vote on that bill is going to plague a great number of the individual Members who voted for it. The House action on the bill is a reflection upon the House as a deliberative body.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman knows that I opposed the bill and caused a roll call upon it?

Mr. BLACK. That is true.

Mr. McFADDEN. And I am perfectly satisfied from the investigations which I have made since that the House was misinformed in regard to the real purpose of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. The purpose of my remarks is to find a way for the House to determine who was responsible. The House should know. In the report on the bill, which was very brief, the committee said:

> The executive branch of the Government has requested the enactment of this legislation at the earliest practicable date, and has satisfactorily demonstrated to the committee the need for it. The legislation is by its very nature probably auxiliary to the emergency legislation enacted and to be enacted by Congress at the present session. It is proper to state that the committee has had the assistance of the Department of Justice in the drafting and preparation of the bill.

This House has already given up a great deal of its power because of the emergency, and when the phrase "emergency" is used by the committee as a reason for passing a bill, the committee ought to be positive that there is a relationship between the emergency and the bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. And I would remark here that there is another bill pending, the arms embargo bill, the purposes of which are not clearly stated, and are not being stated in the hearings that have already been held.

Mr. BLACK. The part of the report which I read states that the Executive branch of the Government requested this bill and its passage at the earliest practicable date. What happened? Immediately after the passage of the bill the chairman of the committee said the bill had to be changed, the President of the United States repudiated the bill, the Department of Justice said it had nothing to do with the bill, and this morning the Secretary of State said, when he learned of the contents of the bill, he was against it. I say that the Committee on the Judiciary, which is made up of some of the best men in the House, owes it to the House to let the public know who gave that committee that bill, what individual in the State Department or in the Department of Justice gave the committee the bill, what individual had the temerity to tell the Committee on the Judiciary that the State Department wanted that bill, and that it was part of the emergency program, when as a matter of fact it was not. Who delivered it to the committee which in turn delivered it to the House? I say the method of the passage of that bill savored of sharp practice. I have never criticized to any extent any committee of this House. I have tried to amend bills but I have never made any wholesale condemnations, and I am not going to do it now, but I say this is a matter of too much importance for this House to let go by lightly.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Surely.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman knows that in the last session of Congress we passed a bill that was similar to the bill that was passed the other day in section 1, without the words "prejudicial to the safety and interest of the United States." That bill was passed in the last session.

Mr. BLACK. An entirely different proposition. The bill that was passed called for censorship of the press of the United States, and it comes with a report which says it is a part of the emergency program. The bill that we passed last session did not call for any press censorship. The gentleman knows it. It transcends in importance almost anything we have done. The idea of a committee coming in, without any previous warning, the leadership of the House making way for them, and saying to the House that the executive branch wanted a bill of this important nature; and then immediately on its passage, almost within 5 minutes, everybody who is supposed to have had anything to do with it absolutely repudiates it! Now, this House sometimes must move quickly. The House must move with understanding, and the House must have faith in somebody in these days. I say, for the sake of our future relations with the executive branch of the Government and for the future standing of this committee and the leadership of this House, the air surrounding this should be cleared up and we should know who was responsible for this report and for the passage of this bill that should never have been passed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KELLER). The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] has expired.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago while we were discussing the farm relief bill, somewhat harsh criticism was made on this floor of certain individuals in the Department of Agriculture who had something to do with the drafting of the bill. Mention was made that certain of those gentlemen, including Dr. Tugwell, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and Mordecai Ezekiel, Chief Economist to Secretary Wallace, had spent several years in Russia, and, if not in fact branded as Communists, were somewhat tainted with communism. I rise today in defense of those gentlemen who have labored long and fearlessly to frame a bill that would at last really relieve the American farmer from the staggering burden under which he has attempted to go ahead for the past 12 years.

I have prepared a résumé of the activities of Mr. Ezekiel in particular, Mr. Speaker, and I ask unanimous consent to extend that in my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I want to clear up once and forever the malicious propaganda that has been disseminated in this country for 12 years by all of the known organized groups on all the effective farm legislation. I refer to one group known as "the Chicago grain traders, or the Chicago grain racketeers"; a second group that I would name is that group known as "the millers' group", composed of the large millers of this country.

I recall, Mr. Speaker, that in 1923 I attended what was known as "the national wheat conference" held in Chicago. This conference was called by eight Governors of wheat-growing States. Governor Donahey, of Ohio, who was one of the Governors on call, sent me to that convention as his personal representative. This convention was attended by 700 delegates from every State in this Union, representing every business, every industry. It was my distinction to have been made a member of the resolutions committee of that convention.

The wheat growers of the Northwest were asking a resolution that would call upon the President to call an extra session of Congress to fix the price of wheat at $1.75 a bushel. That resolution failed in this committee by 1 vote. It was then introduced on the floor of the convention and failed there. The opponents of that resolution at that time were the same group—the millers and the large grain traders and grain exporters—headed largely by Julius Barnes and Sidney Anderson. The same kind of poison, the same misinformation was disseminated then, 10 years ago, as is now being broadcast against the enactment into law of any and all farm-relief measures that really relieve. The final conclusion of that great convention was that the people of this country should be asked to consume more wheat as a solution of the wheat-growers' problem. I well remember at its conclusion, white-haired John Trumbull, president of the Farmers' National Union of Kansas, made this statement:

> Well, the only hope that we can take back to our wheat growers of Kansas is to urge their friends to eat an extra slice of toast in the morning to save the wheat grower.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] has expired.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I want to remind this Congress that the wheat growers then were asking for $1.75 a bushel for their wheat. Under the farm bill adopted by the House, which I understand the Senate either has or will shortly report favorably, it is proposed to establish a price level of 93 cents a bushel for wheat. When anyone asks me, "Will this bill really help the farmer; will it really be of benefit to agriculture?" My answer is, "Will 93-cent wheat, will 7-cent hogs, will 26 cents a pound butterfat, will 13-cent cotton be of benefit to the farmers of this country?"

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge that the malicious efforts of these organized groups which also have included not the international bankers, this is too mild a name for them, but the international butchers of human happiness, be checked. When you read all this false propaganda, all these vicious attempts to slander individuals in the hope that all farm-relief legislation may be effectively strangled, just remember the source from which it has come.

The methods employed by opponents of the farm relief bill should not be permitted to pass unnoticed. There is a surprising similarity between the unjust, the maliciously false campaign of propaganda being employed against this bill, and the campaigns employed by certain vested interests against other farm measures in the past. Either unwilling or unable, or both, to debate the merits of the bill, they have concentrated their attack on some of the individuals who helped frame it. If they were in the habit of sticking to the facts, no one could criticize them severely. Unfortunately they have not even bothered to find what the facts were. Had they done so their attack on personalities would have collapsed.

We have heard a vast amount of nonsense about the Russian influence on this bill. It has been said that Members of Congress were comparing copies of the bill with statements of Russia's 5-year plan, and seeing visions of the long arm of Joseph Stalin getting a strangle-hold on American agriculture.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is it decent for grown men to fall for that sort of hokum? The grain trade and the Chicago Tribune have been peddling that sort of hogwash for so long I thought everyone in Congress was now able to discount it. No one who knows the first thing about the Soviet plans and methods, and who has examined with an open mind the provisions of our own farm bill, can by any stretch of the imagination see the slightest parallel.

The truth is that this bill, like other measures proposed by the administration, provides the only intelligent course this Nation can take, unless it is willing to fall prey to revolution, to anarchy, and then, indeed, to communism or fascism. Far from taking us toward communism, this bill staves off communism and preserves every possible advantage of the traditional American way of doing things.

Some members of the opposition have not been satisfied with outlandish generalities. They have made misstatements, inaccurate and unjust statements about the authors of the bill. Now, it is perfectly proper and even necessary to know who wrote a bill and what his ideas may be. But in all fairness to the cause of American agriculture, let us get at the facts and let us stick to them.

Much of the attack has been concentrated on Secretary Wallace's economic adviser, Mordecai Ezekiel. Because his name is not common, because he is not John Smith or Frank Brown or Richard Roe, some people become suspicious. They do not like names they never heard before.

Mr. Ezekiel, I am reliably informed, was made Economic Adviser to the Secretary of Agriculture because the Secretary has known him, liked him, and admired his ability and intelligence for the past 10 years. Mr. Ezekiel was chosen to help draft the new farm bill because he is an authority on agricultural economics, and because for the past 7 years at least he has given much of his time to the study of the farm surplus problem.

You have heard that he spent 2 or 3 years in Russia. The facts are that he spent 4 weeks in Russia—and did not meet Stalin.

The Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Tugwell, incidentally, is also accused of having spent a year or more in Russia. The truth is that he spent precisely 6 weeks in Russia—and he did not meet Stalin, either.

I find that Mr. Ezekiel, for all that his name is less common than Smith or Jones, was actually born right here in America. He is a native of Virginia, which Commonwealth has not, to my knowledge, gone Bolshevist. His father also was born in Virginia, and his mother in South Carolina. The Ezekiel family, long known in Richmond, traces its American lineage back to colonial days.

Let me list briefly the main facts in the career of Mr. Ezekiel, inasmuch as some of the interests opposed to the bill have chosen to spread abroad, openly and covertly, so many misstatements. Here is the record:

Graduated in agronomy, University of Maryland, 1918, with honors.

In training camp, Plattsburg, N.Y., summer 1918. Commissioned second lieutenant infantry, September 1918. Served training men for overseas duty. Discharged December 1918.

Employed in United States Census Bureau from late 1919 to middle of 1922 checking, revising, and preparing text of census reports for 1920 census.

July 1922 to February 1930 employed in Division of Farm Management, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, developing method of statistical analysis, and pioneered in applying it to the problem of farm management, agricultural production, and economic analysis of reasons for changes in prices; assisted in the development of the agricultural outlook work, Department of Agriculture, and in its popularization and application throughout the country.

February 1930 to March 1933, Assistant Chief Economist, Federal Farm Board; advised the Board as to probable economic effects of its operations, assisted in the preparation of the second and third annual reports of the Board, was particularly charged with proposals concerned with farm relief and the adjustment of agricultural production under the direction of the Board; collaborated with Prof. M. L. Wilson during the last year in developing and perfecting farm-relief proposals, from which the administration's farm bill was evolved.

From September 1930 through August 1931 was on leave without pay from the Board to study in Europe under a fellowship from the Guggenheim Foundation for economic study. Studied in England, Germany, Italy, Russia, and France, and visited incidentally many of the smaller European countries, giving particular attention to the effect of governmental activities on economic conditions and to government policies affecting the European demand for American farm products.

His book, Methods of Correlation Analysis, was published in 1930 and has been adopted as a text by many agricultural colleges and other colleges throughout the country. In addition, he has published many technical articles in Journal of American Statistical Association, Journal of Farm Economics, American Economic Review, the Quarterly Journal of Economics, the Journal of Political Economy, and has published a few popular articles in such journals as Wallace's Farmer, the Country Gentleman, Pennsylvania Farmer, and other agricultural magazines.

In March 1933 was appointed Economic Adviser in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture and has been working with Secretary Wallace in developing his plans for farm relief.

Has taken additional graduate training from time to time; received M.S. in economics from University of Minnesota, 1923, and Ph.D. from Robert Brookings Graduate School, Washington, D.C., 1926.

In addition to college and governmental experience and training, has worked on farms at various times, and owned and operated a small farm north of Washington for several years.

For a number of years, as I have said, Mr. Ezekiel has been preoccupied with the farm surplus problem. His writings reveal an intensive study of it as long ago as 1926. That year he presented a paper before the American Association for the Advancement of Science on the topic, Kinds of Agricultural Surplus. He pointed out at that time that large-scale storing, such as the Farm Board's stabilization program involved—offers little promise of materially improving returns to farmers unless it is coupled with some effective control of acreage of crops and numbers of livestock.

In December 1928, four months before the act establishing the Farm Board became law, Mr. Ezekiel made an address on the surplus problem before the American Farm Economic Association (published in Journal of Farm Economics, April 1929). Once again he forecast the perils of the policy later pursued by the Farm Board, when he discussed the possible results of storing wheat from one crop year to another, as follows:

In estimating the effect of withdrawing part of the supply from the market, two assumptions were made: (1) that the resulting increase in price would reduce our consumption and export of wheat just as much as would a corresponding increase in price due to a short supply; and (2) that the action of the agency in storing wheat would cause those who buy wheat for storing until another year to reduce their purchases to the minimum amount needed for mill operation and usual reserves.

The point should be emphasized that there can be no "psychological effect" of storing on prices unless someone is induced to buy the supply that is left for sale at the price that is established. The consumer is certainly likely to continue to respond to price as he has done previously, and the storer-for-a-profit is more likely to be intimidated than encouraged by the fact that the agency is also storing.

And at the close of his paper Mr. Ezekiel wrote:

There is one additional method of treating the surpluses which depress prices below the profit line which has not been mentioned yet, and that is by not producing them. * * * It does seem that * * * application of facts aimed at the proper direction of production will in the long run prove to be the most effective means that can be used to "settle the farm problem."

Mr. Ezekiel's economic analysis was bountifully verified by the results of the Farm Board's stabilization efforts. During the period of the Farm Board's heaviest wheat buying, however—from November 1930 through the following spring—Mr. Ezekiel was absent on leave without pay.

Mr. Ezekiel's observations on Russia may also be pertinent at this time. While in Europe he wrote two articles on Russian agriculture for Wallace's Farmer, and they were published in that magazine in July 1931. Another article, published in the Journal of Farm Economics for April 1932, was in part a report on his whole European trip, and was entitled "European Competition in Agricultural Production."

We find him writing in Wallace's Farmer as follows:

Many American engineers have helped at one time or another with the development of the Verblut State farms. Many have found the going here or on other State farms too rough, or the accumulation of petty annoyances too great, and have broken their contracts to return home before the end of their stated 2 years. Certainly, living conditions in Russia are far below American standards. When a man feels that, in spite of putting up with many hardships and enduring many inconveniences, he is not accomplishing anything, then it is no wonder that he should quit. Yet that is just the way that many foreign specialists in Russia feel. They are advisers only, and their advice usually seems to be ignored. The Russian workman—especially the ignorant, uneducated workman—has a sublime faith in his own knowledge and ability which is ludicrous. While we were at Verblut a new 24-foot combine was being assembled, the first of that size to be put together in Russia. Two Americans from the factory were there to help in getting it set up, one of them an engineer who had helped plan and design the machine. But would the workmen pay any attention to their suggestions? Not at all! They knew all about machinery, they said. They would put it together the way they knew it should go. And, according to their own ideas, they attempted to put it together, until when pieces put on upside down or backwards failed to fit or function they at last discovered that something was wrong, and then proudly announced as their own invention that it should be done the way they had first been told to do it.

MAKE "NEW" DISCOVERY

In another case, soybeans were to be threshed with a combine. One of the American specialists suggested how to set the teeth in the cylinder and adjust the speeds to do the job properly. Later he found the machine set as had seemed right to the workers, running full blast and churning the beans into an excellent imitation of soybean-oil butter. Again the workers announced proudly that they had discovered something. No one before had ever had the idea of threshing beans with a combine—they were the first on earth to try it! The engineer's statements that it had been done for 20 years in America, and could be done with the same combine far better than they were doing it, fell on deaf ears. The Russians thought they had discovered something new under the sun, and both the joy and the arrogance of discoverers were theirs.

Only when something goes wrong; when a motor refuses to start, when a part fails repeatedly from unknown causes, when "something goes haywire", then is the advice of the American adviser asked for and heeded. That is the real reason why he is still there. In times of stress he can be appealed to as a last resort and can be depended upon to straighten the trouble out.

The socialistic ideas make it difficult to achieve a smoothly working, coordinated organization. Every Russian worker has been told that he is as good as every other man; in the frequent planning meetings he has helped discuss the plans of his unit, and has voted on counterplans to show that the workers will set their goals even higher than the management has set its. As a result he feels that he is his own boss; he alone is responsible for what he does; and no one has the right to tell him what to do. A successful Russian executive must be much more than merely a planner and a "boss"; in addition he must be a persuasive orator, must have endless patience, and he must excel in tact in appealing to men's sense of humor and sense of duty.

In his article in the Journal of Farm Economics, which had been read before the meeting of the American Farm Economics Association previously, Mr. Ezekiel summed up his impressions this way:

The Russian situation is so distinctive that it requires special treatment. In discussing developments in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics we must be careful not to attribute all progress to the new organization of economic life alone. Communism is organizing a constantly increasing sector of economic life on the lines of a planful state socialism; but in addition it is introducing applied science generally in what previously was a semi-medieval country. No outsider can judge whether the economic organization of Russia is as yet superior to that of other countries. There can be no question, however, as to the productive advantages of applied science over the former primitive culture of the Russian peasant. Not only in the technique of production but in education, in sanitation and health, and, yes, even in propaganda, the new Russia is using everything that she can learn from modern science. True, it is often used blunderingly and awkwardly. We must remember, however, that in England and America the machine civilization was not built in 1 year or even 5. Russia is attempting the task of remaking a people as well as building a new economic system. Whether or not we sympathize with the harsh methods used in the process, we must recognize the substantial progress which has been made. How much of this progress can be attributed to the socialistic economy and how much to applied science is a more difficult matter and one that I cannot attempt to answer.

In spite of the industrial progress which has been made, Russia is still primarily a producer of raw materials. The modern product, oil, has been added to wheat and wood as a product for export. Under communism, as under the Czar, Russian agriculture must still produce the bulk of the surplus wealth to buy western machinery and equipment to modernize Russia.

A vast quantity of capital goods and a great deal of trained technical skill are still needed to complete the program of industrialization. The pressure to pay still rests on the Russian peasant—the mujik. The present world crisis, with its reduction in the value of wheat and cotton, has borne on Russia no less heavily than on other raw-material exporters.

Recent dispatches from Moscow indicate that more immediate attention is to be paid to increasing the output of consumption goods. Some of the planned increases in heavy industry for the last year of the plan are to be reduced. One must always be chary of giving full credence to startling reports from Moscow; what actually goes on through the broad stretches of Russia is not always immediately sensitive to changes in official sentiment at the center. It is difficult to judge how significant this reported change in policy will prove to be.

More than once this fall reports have come out that collective farms and even State farms were refusing to give up the allotted proportion of grain, that they were holding onto unauthorized reserves. It may be that this widespread passive resistance has convinced the Kremlin that new concessions to the peasants must be made. Certainly standards of food and heating last winter seemed to have reached an irreducible minimum; the further effort of carrying through 1 year more, with insufficient harvests, may have forced the strain too near the breaking point.

The question of depreciation of machinery is still a troublesome one. Increasing dependence on Russian-made machinery will increase the rate of depreciation, for a time at least. The poor quality of so much of the manufactured products in Russia is well illustrated by this statement from the Moscow News, a quotation from a worker in one of the tractor factories: "The foundry was—and still is—the weak spot. One of the drawbacks is the bad quality of sand and pig iron. The fact that sand is not graded retards our schedules seriously." This weakness in technical care is characteristic. Russian research workers, scientists, and metallurgists are busy working on the problem; but meanwhile the mechanic in the factory and the peasant in the field go blithely ahead, ignoring the advice of the expensive foreign specialists, until they learn by their own experience how to do the job.

Mr. Ezekiel concludes his paper by saying:

This review of the foreign competitive situation leads to only one sure conclusion—competition in the sale of agricultural products on foreign markets will continue as keen as ever. Severe restrictions on trade will continue or increase so long as prices remain low or declining. Until world economic and political policies are changed, much of the competition will be senseless from an economic point of view, for the highest-cost producers will be encouraged to expand, while the lowest-cost producers will be compelled to reduce and make the needed adjustments. Present international economic policies might be designated broadly as one of senseless grabbing for oneself. Each nation has been trying to make itself prosperous by hurting the business of other nations. An opposite policy, of international economic cooperation, would look to improving the business of one nation by improving the business of other nations with which it does business. It is difficult to tell when the swing back to such a world policy will commence, or even if it ever will. Perhaps the protectionist developments recently begun in England will mark the high-water mark of economic nationalism; for certainly England cannot maintain her previous standards of living under a policy of high protection. Even in the United States there are signs that doubts are beginning to arise as to the ultimate wisdom of a policy of extreme protectionism.

This was written in 1931.

More than any other nation the United States has the power to take steps to correct the conditions which now are steadily strangling international trade. Until those steps are taken it may be impossible to restore world confidence in the future. The level of prices cannot be restored until a sound basis for confidence has been created. Both in domestic markets and in foreign markets the prices of agricultural exports reflect the lack of confidence and the extreme competition which it produces.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks some statistics and a report of a monetary commission created in August 1876 on the silver question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, during the short time we have been here in this special session of Congress, we have passed several bills which I believe will be of great benefit to the country, and in the next few days I understand we will have the bill providing for refinancing of farm mortgages.

I am glad we now have, for the first time in many years, a President who understands the common, average working people who are entitled to some consideration. In my judgment, most of these measures will afford temporary relief and, in order to have permanent relief for the people of this country, it is necessary that something further be done to raise commodity prices. The bill that, if enacted into law, will relieve present conditions in connection with these other bills, is a bill that provides for issuing sound currency and remonetizing silver. Silver certificates should be issued against silver bullion that may be purchased by the Treasury Department.

Governments are established by the consent of the governed; and when any government fails to be administered for the benefit of the people, then the people have the right to change that government. Elected representatives of the people should be responsive to their will and need. This Government that we all love so well must be taken out of the hands of the money changers, the same class that the Savior drove from the temple for the usurpation of power and for despoiling that sacred place under the name of Christianity. The people must exert their rights and demand them. Who says that an increase of our actual circulation of money—sound currency—will not relieve the awful conditions that now confront our people?

My colleagues, we read in the public press every day of good people of this country driving away from our courthouses those who would foreclose mortgages upon their homes—homes that our citizens have been years in establishing—homes where they had hoped to spend their last days in some degree of comfort—homes for which they slaved for many years to establish. Then in their gray hair, when their working days and vigor are gone, it is that old story "over the hills to the poorhouse." I am ready to try any experiment that may be of assistance. I have not yet heard a single Member of this House, nor any economist, deny that we need more money in actual circulation. Yes, we have money in this country like we had last year, the year before, and the year before that, but it is not all circulating.

A short time ago the Secretary of the Treasury offered $250,000,000 in 5-year notes bearing 2⅝ percent interest, with subscriptions in 1 day of $8,000,000,000. A few days ago the Treasury Department offered $800,000,000 in bonds bearing 4¼ percent interest, and this issue was oversubscribed in the sum of $1,820,000,000. Some say that issuing currency as provided by the Federal Reserve Act or the purchase of silver as provided in some of these silver bills and the issuance thereon of silver certificates or paper money would destroy our financial system. Well, who here denies that our present financial system should be changed? The United States Government has issued paper currency to November 30, 1932, in the sum of $90,595,554,363, and our Government still stands. How are we going to pay our public debt and put our people to work, unless something of this kind is done?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANK. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman explain in his remarks, if he can, the jump in the interest rate from about three fourths of 1 percent to 4¼ percent in the course of a few days' time?

Mr. SWANK. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that I cannot explain why it was done, but it has been done.

Mr. McFARLANE. In the instance of the issue previous to the $800,000,000 issue, as I remember, the Government paid only three fourths of 1 percent.

Mr. SWANK. The public debt of the United States in 1790 amounted to $54,000,000, of which $12,000,000 was due foreign creditors, chiefly in France. State debts amounted to $21,000,000, which were assumed by our new Government. These debts had all been paid by 1837. January 31, 1933, the gross public debt of the United States amounted to the enormous sum of $20,801,707,134.01.

The countries with which we carry on our principal export trade are those that have gone off the gold standard and are now on a silver basis. We have always enjoyed a large export trade with England, China, and Japan. An article appeared in the Seattle Star January 4, 1933, stating that 50,000 American fishermen find their jobs endangered by a flood of canned food by cheap Japanese labor. This article says that Japanese fishermen are paid wages from 25 to 40 cents per day and that the tariff against this canned food does not work because of the decreased value of the Japanese yen, their unit of money. The old value of the yen was 50 cents, but since they have left the gold standard the yen has decreased in value to 12 cents in our money. The same story is true with the other countries to which we export large values in our goods. Mr. Speaker, with these facts staring us in the face we are still wedded to our gold standard and refuse remonetization of silver. This would not only revive the silver industry and put thousands of men to work, but would open up our foreign trade.

Under the present gold standard law a person who has a quantity of gold bullion may take it to any United States mint and have it coined into money free of charge. After it is coined into money he can have the gold coin delivered to him or can have the gold certificates representing the coin. He will, of course, take these certificates. If silver is remonetized, it will be coined into money in the same manner and certificates issued representing silver bullion.

The simplest and most direct manner of issuing money at this time is to issue Treasury or Federal Reserve notes, or, in other words, currency, which can be done under our present gold standard law, and put it into circulation by paying expenses of government, namely, Federal salaries, pensions, compensation, and other expenses. To those who are loud in their praise of our gold standard law let me say that under that law we can issue over $5,000,000,000 in currency and still be within our gold standard law, which requires a 40 percent gold reserve for the issuance of Federal Reserve notes or paper currency. All economists say that an increased and proper circulation of our money will at once cause a rise in commodity prices, and especially products of the farm, and the farm is the place where prosperity must begin. The history of money and prices points to the fact that an increased price of gold is followed by a decrease in commodity prices. If wheat should sell for $1 per bushel instead of 25 cents, the present price, the dollar may be said to be cheapened.

We hear much talk from the men who control the gold and who buy Government bonds about the honest dollar, but they do not say anything about an honest wheat dollar, or cotton dollar, or corn dollar, or labor dollar. When currency or "greenback" money was issued to help pay the expenses of the Civil War, a great howl went up from the money powers at that time about the dishonest dollar, but, notwithstanding it was not legal tender for the payment of interest on the public debt, nor for duty on imports, yet its issuance was followed by a wave of prosperity. As soon as the volume of currency was reduced and silver demonetized, under the act of February 12, 1873, known as the "crime of 1873," industries declined, business became stagnant, idleness was present, and there was depression in all business. Under our present money system nonproducers instead of the producers control the issuance and circulation of our money.

I warn the great money powers of the United States to take heed of the temper of our people. They have come to the realization of the fact that the Constitution of the United States puts in Congress the power to coin money and regulate its value, and that right is not given to the money interests by our basic law. Let me warn them to stop, look, and listen. Our people are losing their homes, hundreds of thousands of them turning to look for the last time, as they go over the hill, at their homes which they intended to provide for their old age. Their rights cannot much longer be trampled underfoot by those who "toil not, neither do they spin." The nontaxable securities of the rich can dwindle in value, the same as the homes of our people.

If we are going to continue our metallic system of money, then silver should be remonetized and used with gold as a basis. Silver was our unit of value long before gold. The Continental Congress of 1786 adopted the silver dollar as the unit of value, and it contained 375.64 grains of silver. This dollar was our standard of value until silver was demonetized in 1873. There would be no danger of the remonetization of silver causing a surplus or too much money. The history of gold and silver production of the entire world contradicts any such likelihood.

The total gold stock of the principal countries of the world December 31, 1931, amounted to 11,940,606,000 ounces. The total world production of gold during the years 1493 to 1931, inclusive, amounted to 1,085,745,695 ounces. The world production of silver for this same period was 14,960,313,580 ounces. From 1792 to 1930 there has been produced in the United States 221,480,830 ounces of gold of the value of $4,578,415,100. During this same period there has been produced in the United States 3,167,273,554 ounces of silver of the value of $2,504,825,617.

The estimated value of gold produced in the world from 1860 to 1930, inclusive, is $17,514,697,412. The Bureau of Mines says that the rejection of silver as a basis of monetary systems, in conjunction with gold, terminated an association that had lasted for centuries. The bureau also says that most oriental countries use silver as a medium of exchange almost to the exclusion of gold.

The production of gold in the United States for the year 1931 amounted to 2,395,878 ounces of the value of $49,527,200, and the production of silver for that year was 30,932,050 ounces of the value of $8,970,294. Under the act of Congress of March 14, 1900, the gold dollar consisted of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, and there are in the United States 11 kinds of lawful money, as follows:

Gold coins, gold certificates, standard silver dollars, silver certificates, subsidiary silver coins, minor coins, United States notes, Treasury notes, Federal Reserve notes, Federal Reserve bank notes, and national-bank notes.

Silver was made the standard unit of value in the United States before gold, and the silver dollar continued to be the standard unit of value in this country until 1873.

August 15, 1876, the Monetary Commission of Congress was created under joint resolution, consisting of 3 Senators, 3 Members of the House, and experts not exceeding 3 in number and, among other things, was to inquire into the relative value of gold and silver, effects upon trade, commerce, and finance, and the productive interests of the country, and upon the standard values of this and foreign countries. This commission also inquired into the policy of the restoration of the double standard and, if restored, what the relations between gold and silver should be. The commission filed a most exhaustive report which makes the following findings:

(1) What is known as the "double-standard value" is the standard based upon the two metals, gold and silver, by laws which establish a unit of value and account in each metal and declare the weight of pure gold and silver which the unit shall contain.

(2) It is all important that the value of the standard should be unchanging. It is not important that the material which represents the value should be unchanging.

(3) Under the double standard a debtor may, at his option, avail himself of money coined out of either metal in the payment of his obligations.

(4) From the beginning of the Revolutionary troubles in South America in 1809 to the opening of the California mines in 1849 there was a continuous rise in the value of money and a corresponding fall in the value of commodities.

(5) After 1849 there occurred a fall in the value of money and a rise in the price of commodities.

(6) The facts that both gold and silver have heretofore been used as money, that prices have been controlled by their combined volume, and that existing contracts on an enormous scale have been entered into on that basis by States, municipalities, corporations, and individuals are the most important of all the facts to be considered in respect of propositions to demonetize either metal. If gold alone had always been used as money, although less steady as a measure of value than gold and silver together, and in other respects less desirable, the objection would be well taken, that the addition of silver would double the existing volume of money and thereby depreciate it, and thus injure the creditor. The arguments of justice and expediency are more cogent against diminishing the mass of money by discarding silver, when both gold and silver have been always and almost universally used as money. The great majority of creditors have other connections with the business operations of the communities in which they live, and other forms of investment than those which constitute them creditors. What they would gain as creditors by a contraction in the volume of money would be partially, if not entirely, lost by their unavoidable participation in the general depression resulting from the fall of prices which such contraction would occasion.

(7) Some nations adopted one metal as their standard and some the other, and some adopted both. Those that adopted both metals served as a balance wheel to steady with exactness their relative value.

(8) Whenever gold and silver prices have become adjusted to a given stock of these metals, an increase of that stock will cause a rise and a decrease will cause a fall in prices. Those who have contracted to pay money find that it is constantly becoming more difficult to meet their engagements.

(9) The worst effect of falling prices is not upon property nor upon debtors but upon laborers, whom it deprives of employment and consigns to poverty, and upon society, which it deprives of that vast amount of wealth which resides potentially in the vigorous arms of idle workmen. A shrinking volume of money transfers existing property unjustly, and causes a concentration and diminution of wealth. It also impairs the value of existing property.

(10) The commission recommend the restoration of the double standard and the unrestricted coinage of both metals, but are unable to agree upon the legal relation which should be established between them.

The chairman and two other members of the commission were of the opinion that the proper legal relation of value to be established in the United States between gold and silver should be 15.5 to 1.

On the 4th day of March 1933, on the east steps of the Capitol, President Franklin D. Roosevelt delivered the greatest inaugural address that I have ever heard or have ever read. He talked the language of the multitude and every person could understand. He denounced these money changers in no uncertain terms, as follows:

Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.

True, they have tried, but their efforts have been cast in the pattern of an outworn tradition. Faced by failure of credit, they have proposed only the lending of more money. Stripped of the lure of profit by which to induce our people to follow their false leadership, they have resorted to exhortations, pleading tearfully for restored confidence. They know only the rules of a generation of self-seekers. They have no vision; and when there is no vision, the people perish.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to act—to call the attention of our people to the true facts causing this depression and to those who are responsible for its continuance. If Congress does not act, the people will. This is the people's Government and should be administered for their welfare and happiness. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in answer to the statement of my distinguished friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

I may say to the House that the bill to which the gentleman refers was passed at the last session in the form of section 1, with a few words added and the words which safeguard the bill omitted, namely "prejudicial to the safety and interest of the United States." It was reported out and was passed by the House. It seems a lot of criticism has come up about the bill at this session.

I have always taken the position that this is the President's session of Congress, and for my part I do not want to push any legislation or advocate any legislation unless it is requested from the White House, because this is his special session.

However, the Committee on the Judiciary, like every other committee of the House, has to rely upon the statements of representatives of Government departments, and representatives of both the State Department and the Department of Justice laid before your committee a bill that was considered and amended by the committee.

There is a lot of misunderstanding evidenced in the talk about this bill suppressing free speech and the press.

Now, what does this bill do? The bill provides:

That whoever, by virtue of his employment by the United States, having custody of, or access to, any record, proceeding, map, book, document, paper, or other thing shall, for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interest of the United States willfully and unlawfully conceal, remove, mutilate, obliterate, falsify, destroy, sell, furnish to another, publish, or offer for sale any such record, proceeding, map, book, document, paper, or thing, or any information contained therein, or a copy or copies thereof, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both, and moreover shall forfeit his office and be forever afterward disqualified from holding any office under the Government of the United States.

There have been instances where men in the Department of Justice, special investigators who have secured information of great value to the Government in a case, for filthy money sold the testimony to the defendants in such cases. Does this House want to put its approval on such conduct for fear it may be criticized about suppressing free speech or interfering with a free press?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman knows the President has repudiated the bill, as well as the State Department and the Department of Justice. So surely they are not defending the measure.

Mr. McKEOWN. I may say to the gentleman that I cannot help it if the President has repudiated it. I am simply stating the justification for our bringing the bill before the House.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. FISH. My distinguished colleague from New York asked if some member of the committee would tell us who was the spokesman who appeared before the committee and recommended this legislation. Is the gentleman from Oklahoma at liberty to answer that question?

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentlemen are employees of the Department of State and the Department of Justice, and they both appeared before the committee and said they wanted the bill. These gentlemen holding places in those Departments put in quite some time passing on the bill, because I was careful in considering the language and inserted the language "prejudicial to the safety or interest of the United States."

Mr. BLACK. They knew how to do the job.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from New York entirely correct in saying that the President has repudiated this bill? All the President did was to say that he did not intend to unduly muzzle the press. This is all that he said.

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not know anything about any repudiation.

Mr. BLACK. The President stated he was against the enactment of the bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not want to get into any controversy about the matter. I am simply stating the plain facts.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. SHANNON. The gentleman realizes that the deliberative part of the Congress, the Senate, will attend to it when the matter gets over there?

Mr. BLACK. The Senate has already done that without deliberation.

Mr. SHANNON. Then without deliberation it has been attended to, and does not the gentleman think it would be a fine thing for the committees to let the House occasionally deliberate on these measures?

Mr. McKEOWN. I agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. SHANNON. And let us propose amendments to them.

Mr. McKEOWN. I agree with the gentleman. The gentleman cannot get any fuss out of me about that, but I say that here is a bill that does not do all the things that you hear talked about with respect to limiting free speech.

Here is the proposition. If this thing involves what we were told it involved, if you have to pay the price of free speech and bring the country into war, I am for suppressing free speech. I do not believe that free speech should drag our country into war.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman knows that countries are generally dragged into war through denial of free speech.

Mr. McKEOWN. No; countries have been dragged into war by the appeal to the patriotic sentiments or to the passions or prejudices of people by so-called "use of free speech."

I am not here to take issue with anybody about this bill except to justify the committee which has been assaulted. I say that the committee acted upon the assumption that it had a right to act upon and to bring in the bill in the interest of the country. I say that the bill does not muzzle the legitimate press, it does not muzzle legitimate free speech. What right has a man to publish anything that is to the detriment and safety of the United States? He has no right, and it is not a denial of free speech to suppress that which threatens this Nation with disaster.

Mr. SWANK. Is not the gentleman a member of the Press Club and a newspaper man?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; I am interested in that profession on the outside.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman emphasizes the legal side of his life, does he not?

Mr. McKEOWN. I try to. I want to say in reference to free speech that no man in this House has been a greater champion of free speech than I, but when it touches the safety of the Republic, when it is a question between free speech and the safety of the Government, I am for my country. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. BLACK] for his able and fearless remarks against the code censorship bill reported by the Judiciary Committee. But I do not join with him in criticizing the Judiciary Committee of this House. It is my own belief that they were imposed upon.

And what can be expected if officials of the State Department and representatives of other Departments come before a committee of the House and say, "This is an emergency measure" and practically intimate that the administration is behind it and that it should be reported out immediately for the safety of our country.

It seems to me that committees ought to be a little more careful and find out whether the representatives of the different departments really represent their chief in the first instance.

I think that this particular bill should not have been referred to the Judiciary Committee. In the other branch of the Congress the same bill has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It has to do with the use of codes between foreign governments and it should have been referred in this House to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

What I object to and what I think most Members object to is the air of mystery and secrecy involved. We as Members of the House are entitled to know the facts, we are entitled to know the facts presented to the committee, and then upon those facts render our decision and not be imposed upon.

I doubt if there was anything that could not have been presented and discussed in this House. If it had to do with foreign affairs and the use and deciphering of foreign codes, it should have gone to the Foreign Affairs Committee. When legislation is brought into the House under a cloud of mystery and secrecy, it can only result in improper and inadequate consideration and produce rumors and exaggerations that might lead to misunderstanding and bad feeling and bad blood between nations. I hope the House and the Judiciary Committee has learned an object lesson and that in the future the facts will be presented to the House before rushing through ill-advised measures.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Not now; I have not the time.

Mr. Speaker, on the evening of April 18 there will be a monster demonstration mass meeting to be held in the Washington Auditorium under the auspices of the National American Legion, with the commander, Mr. Louis A. Johnson, of the Legion, presiding, in opposition to the recognition of Soviet Russia. All Members of the House and Senate and the Cabinet members have been invited officially by the national commander of the Legion. If there are Members who will have guests, members of their families, or constituents from back home here at that time who want extra tickets, I believe that if they will get in touch with my secretary we can get the extra tickets for this mass meeting. The speakers will be Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, Father Edmund Walsh, Senator KING, and myself. It is expected that two or three hundred national patriotic, civic, church, and fraternal organizations will also be represented by their officials and the officers of those organizations.

I also want to take the opportunity to announce that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives have submitted a minority report upon the proposed embargo bill. Before you gentlemen make up your minds how you are going to vote upon this important issue, I think, as Members of the House, it is your duty to read these reports, both the minority and the majority reports, and particularly to read the letter of Mr. John Bassett Moore, recognized as the foremost authority in international law in the world—a letter of some 10 pages—which is included in the minority views in opposition to the embargo.

Mr. Speaker, I rose for the purpose of trying to make clear to the Members of the House that there exists in the Department of Justice a report written by two efficient and reliable agents of that Department several years ago, after a 6 weeks' intensive investigation of alleged sabotage against the Akron. These two agents are still in the Department of Justice and can be called at any time as witnesses to testify before any committee created by the Congress to investigate the destruction of the Akron. I had the privilege, and I am one of the few I think, together with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], who have read that report.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman put the names of those agents in the RECORD?

Mr. FISH. I do not know these two agents who made the investigation. I do know their records, and that they are still there, and that they are very highly regarded. I do know a good deal about the agents of the Department of Justice, and I can assure you gentlemen that they are selected men, and any reports coming from agents of the Department of Justice in the last few years are reliable. These men were sent out to Akron, Ohio, because there were reports or indications of sabotage. They stayed there 6 weeks and were engaged as employees of the construction company, with the knowledge of the construction company. They finally located what they thought to be the guilty parties and became friends with them, and practically lived with the man who was accused, a former lieutenant of the Hungarian Navy, who was working as a mechanic on the Akron. He confessed to them that he was an avowed Communist. He took these agents to Communist meetings, and he told them that he was deliberately sabotaging the Akron, that as a mechanic he was cutting bolts and rivets and so on and welded over them. Whether these defective rivets were all discovered will never be known or how much, if any, they contributed to the Akron disaster. That report has been on file for 2 years. The Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs told me that he had not read it. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC], who was the chairman of the subcommittee to investigate the matter, told me that he had not read it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] has read it, and I think he will agree that it is one of the most amazing reports that he ever read.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Gladly.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad of the opportunity to tell the House some of the things that I saw in that amazing report. There have been times in the past when I have questioned, and with cause, the efficiency and the integrity of certain investigators in the Department of Justice. To me this report disclosed an efficiency heretofore unknown.

I happened to be a member of the subcommittee appointed by the Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee to read this report while the committee was investigating the charges of sabotage in the construction of the Akron. It is a very voluminous report, and it is a most enlightening report, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has pointed out. These investigators worked with these communists who were trying to damage the Akron. They would make their reports to the officials of the company, and the inspectors would "conveniently" find everything that had been done, so far as we know, to in any way injure the ship.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes.

Mr. BOLAND. Is it not a fact that at that hearing it was shown that in many instances where things were marked defective, that they were taken out and replaced?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Always. I think that happened in every case.

Mr. BOLAND. And would not the gentleman admit that there was some defective work when that had to be done to that ship?

Mr. WOODRUFF. In the construction of anything, an inspector usually finds some reason to complain, because work done by the human hand is rarely, if ever, perfect. Those conditions were found on the Akron, but we have been dealing with these attempts at sabotage, and I say that if the Department of Justice will always operate as efficiently as it did in that particular instance it will be a credit to this country.

Personally, I can see no reason why this report should not be made public. Certainly, if the Members of this House could read it, they would find, as I did, that it is a most compelling reason for adding to our criminal statutes a law under which individuals could be punished for deliberately doing things which in all probability would result not alone in destruction of property but also in maiming of human beings and the loss of life itself.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I want this report published, and I have been assured the cooperation of the Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who says that he will subpena that report if necessary and make it public. I am sorry that it was not released 2 years ago. The reason I want it made public is to show that there is no Federal law under which individuals who attempt sabotage on a ship like the Akron can be punished.

My own view of the disaster to the Akron is that there were three contributing factors—the sabotage by Kassay, the accident at Lakehurst, and the 18,000 pounds overweight in the dirigible when built.

I do not know enough about airships to pass judgment on whether such additional weight would seriously impair the seaworthiness or the stormworthiness of the Akron, but it might well have been an important factor. Furthermore, the constructing company wanted to sell and the Navy wanted to buy, as evidenced by the company paying a $25,000 penalty for overweight and the Navy Department accepting the Akron.

When this man, Paul Kassay, was caught by those agents, and after their report was made, he was tried under the Ohio syndicalist law; and when he went to trial, the State syndicalist law was held unconstitutional by the trial judge, and the proceedings lapsed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I have taken up much of the gentleman's time, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. So that, this former Hungarian lieutenant, an avowed Communist, who admitted attempting to commit sabotage upon the Akron, is a free man. He may be in this country at the present time, due to the fact, largely, that we have no Federal law that will deal with such a situation.

Now, what happens in far-away Russia? When they think there is any sabotage going on in any industry, they reach out and grab about 30 men, and then give them the third degree, and execute them. That has been done repeatedly for years past. Even now Great Britain is breaking off her trade relations and possibly her diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia because her spokesman in the foreign office says that they know that they cannot get a fair trial for their citizens in Soviet Russia. But when a Communist, or, as I believe in this case, an alien Communist comes here and practices sabotage against an airship, in order to destroy not only that which will become the property of the Government, but the lives of our officers and enlisted men in the Navy he escapes scotfree. I do not want you to take my word for it or the word of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], but I want this report made by those two agents of the Department of Justice, at the risk of their lives, made public immediately. They actually had to go into Communist meetings; and when they finally quit, it was because some of the Communists got suspicious and called a special meeting and wanted them to come there and show their Communist cards and prove that they were bona-fide Communists, and so they had to quit. I want to show you that the same thing can happen in this country again as we have no Federal laws to punish such offenses. They can sabotage other airships and get away with it. Is it not about time the Committee on the Judiciary, which hastened to report the secrecy code bill the other day, reported the Jeffers or Tarver bill, similar to the old Eslick bill that gives the Department of Justice some power to investigate Communist activities in the United States of America? The Department of Justice has had no right whatever to investigate any revolutionary or any Communist activities at all since 1925. I am not asking for a restoration of the Espionage Act or the right to raid and arrest. I am against it. I simply want some power given to the Department of Justice, which every civilized government has placed in some executive department, to investigate and keep in contact with these revolutionary activities, whether it is sabotage or whether it is aimed to overthrow the Government by force and violence. There is no such power at the present time.

In the last session the Eslick bill was reported out and a rule was obtained, but it was never brought up in the Congress. That bill simply gives the Department of Justice the right to investigate. One of the reasons the Department of Justice kept this entire report under cover was because they did not have the right to investigate that sabotage. They took it upon themselves, on the basis that the airship Akron in course of construction may become Government property in the future. They have the right to protect Government property, but they said, "This may become Government property, and we will take a chance and send out these two agents." They did not have the real right, and therefore they were disinclined to make this report public. That was 2 years ago. I am not making any charges that the destruction of the Akron was due to the sabotage of Paul Kassay or some other Communists who joined with him, because I believe the constructing company found out and remedied most of the damages. Probably whatever he tried to destroy was made good. I assume that to be the fact. However, some of the defects and sabotage may have never been discovered and have been a contributing factor in the collapse and destruction of the Akron. I want it clearly understood that the report should be made available to the public and the agents called to testify. They are subject to call by this House or any committee of this House. I hope that next week those agents will be invited to testify before whatever committee is created to look into the matter and that the people of America will be given all the facts and will know how to deal with future legislation aimed at sabotage and to prevent it in the future. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has again expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

DECREASE OUR WANTS OR INCREASE OUR MEANS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, Benjamin Franklin is credited with this wise saying, that we must either decrease our wants or increase our means. That is the condition our country is in today. The people of this Nation are accustomed to a high standard of living. They are accustomed to all the comforts and conveniences of life. In order for that high standard of living to be maintained we must do what Franklin said was necessary to be done, increase the means of the American people.

EVERY BUSINESS GOES DOWN WITH THE FARMERS

If you deflate this country to present levels, you will cause more misery, poverty, and distress. May I invite your attention to the fact that the national income, which is the means of the people of this Nation, goes right along with the purchasing power of the farmers of this country. During the year 1929 the farmers of this Nation sold all their commodities and products on the market for $10,000,000,000. During that same year the national income of all the people of this country amounted to $85,000,000,000. The next year, 1930, the value of commodities that were sold by the farmers, although practically the same amount was produced, decreased from $10,000,000,000 in 1929 to $7,800,000,000 in 1930. Remember, during the same year the national income of the people of this Nation was reduced from 85 billion in 1929 to 71 billion in 1930.

ALL GO DOWN TOGETHER

You will notice that as the purchasing power of the farmer is destroyed, the national income of all the people of this Nation is destroyed. In 1931 the farmers only received $5,500,000,000 for everything they produced, only half as much as in 1929, although they produced practically the same amount. In the same year, 1931, the national income was reduced to $54,000,000,000.

LOWER STANDARD OF LIVING NOT WANTED

In 1932 the farmers only received $4,000,000,000 for what they produced, which was practically the same amount as in each of the 3 preceding years, and the national income, the people's means, was reduced to $37,500,000,000.

I want to put side by side in the RECORD the farmer's income in the past 4 years and the national income the last 4 years:

	Farmers crops	National income
1929	$10, 100, 000, 000	$85, 200, 000, 000
1930	7, 800, 000, 000	71, 000, 000, 000
1931	5, 500, 000, 000	54, 000, 000, 000
1932	4, 000, 000, 000	37, 500, 000, 000

As the purchasing power of the farmer decreased, the purchasing power of all the people of the Nation decreased. Buying power of the farmer must be restored in order that the buying power of all the people may be restored. If you want the people of this Nation to maintain the high standard of living they are accustomed to maintaining, you must do what Benjamin Franklin said, increase the means of the people; either increase their means or decrease their wants. You do not want a lower standard of living. You do not want the people to decrease their wants. If you do not, you must increase their means. One way to do this is to start with the farmers and increase their purchasing power. As their purchasing power is increased the national income is increased, and the purchasing power of all the people is increased. The farmers can then buy what the manufacturer produces, and the wage earners can buy what the farmer has to sell. No section and no class, except the privileged class, can prosper alone. Generally, we must all prosper together or we cannot prosper at all.

DEFLATION MUST BE ARRESTED

We have deflation going on right now. There is no inflationary movement in this country. There is no movement that could be construed as an expansion of the currency movement. During the last month we have had banks closed holding deposits of the people amounting to $6,000,000,000. This is equal to a $72,000,000,000 deflation in a year, because the money and credits are turning over about 12 times a year. During the last 3 weeks the Federal Reserve banks have taken out of circulation more than $1,000,000,000 of actual money, which has caused additional deflation of $12,000,000,000 a year. This is a deflation of $7,000,000,000 in actual money and credits during the last 4 weeks, which will equal a deflation of $84,000,000,000 in a year. Money and credit are not helpful to the people unless it circulates.

PRICES OF GOVERNMENT BONDS INDICATE DEFLATION OR INFLATION

Let me invite your attention to the fact that those who control and always will control our monetary system, unless its present set-up is radically changed, are the men who largely control the Government bond market. Watch the United States Government bond market. Whenever you see United States Government bonds going up, you can take that as an indication of a deflationary movement. Why? The man with money in his possession desiring to invest it wisely will have the promise of receiving annually $4 per $100 on a 4-percent Government bond. If he things there is going to be deflation, he will want that bond because the $4 will purchase so much in commodities and services that will go down in price. If he thinks there is going to be inflation, he wants something that will pay a higher interest rate, because commodities, wages, and services will increase in price. Therefore he sells Government bonds and invests in something that will pay a higher interest rate, because prices of commodities are going to increase.

If you want to know whether to expect a period of deflation or inflation, watch the United States Government bond market, and you may find a very strong indication. There is nothing now to indicate an expansion of the currency. I hope the time will come in the very near future when Congress can give more time and attention to the currency and credit problem.

INTEREST ON GOVERNMENT BONDS SHOULD BE ELIMINATED

I heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS] make a very interesting statement here this morning, that he believed the interest rate on Government bonds should be reduced to 2 percent, that we now have outstanding $21,000,000,000 of Government securities and that we could save something like $274,000,000 a year in this way. May I suggest in this connection something not generally understood: Although we have outstanding $21,000,000,000 in Government bonds, the United States Treasury holds a large amount of securities to offset these bonds. A large part of this money was loaned to foreign countries. It was loaned to railroads, to insurance companies, and to banks. Today if the Government of the United States were paid every penny that is due on the bonds it holds of foreign Governments, the bonds of railroad companies, banks, and insurance companies, our national debt would not be $7,000,000,000. So there is an offset to a large part of this debt.

GOVERNMENT INTEREST RATE

But now to go back to the question of reducing the interest rate, a few days ago the Secretary of the Treasury wanted to borrow $100,000,000, and this money has been loaned to this Government for an average rate of interest of about 1 percent, or $1 for the use of $100 for 1 year, although it was borrowed for 90 days. There is no reason why the Government should pay 2 percent interest. There is no reason why the Government should pay one penny of interest.

GOVERNMENT'S IDIOTIC SYSTEM OF PUTTING MONEY INTO CIRCULATION

Let us go back and analyze for a moment the policy of this Government in regard to the borrowing of money. When the Government wants to borrow $100,000,000, the Government issues bonds and sells these bonds to the Chase National Bank, the National City Bank, or other banks and gets credit for them. It then permits the banks buying these bonds to bring them right back to Washington and put them in the vault of the Treasury of the United States and return to New York with $100,000,000 in new money, except 5 percent of any kind of money—not necessarily gold—to be used as a redemption fund for the money. At the same time the banks are using this money they get interest on the deposited bonds. This makes a double obligation of the United States Government. Why do indirectly what can be done directly? We can save the Government $725,000,000 a year in interest by issuing the currency directly instead of issuing bonds and then issuing the money upon the bonds as security. The country would be helped more if this $725,000,000 a year were scattered all over the Nation rather than received by a few holders of Government bonds.

PAY OFF NATIONAL DEBT WITH NEW MONEY

The United States Government could today safely pay every dollar of its indebtedness with the same kind of money that was turned out by the printing presses here a few days ago to let the banks have when the banks were in distress, money that will be an obligation against our Government exactly like the bond that is now held by the bondholder. The only difference is that the bond bears interest and the money would not bear interest.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

WOULD NOT BE TOO MUCH MONEY

Mr. PATMAN. The argument will be made that there will be too much money if we do this. Let us see. From a table prepared by the National Industrial Conference Board I have the information that in 1880 more than 44 percent of the deposits was real cash or money in circulation, while in 1930—50 years later—only 8 percent of the deposits was real cash or money in circulation. During this 50-year period the deposits in banks increased 25.9 times. If the money had increased in the same proportion, we should have $24,864,000,000 in circulation today instead of having about one fifth that amount. The argument will be made that a large part of our business is done on credit. It was true at one time about nine tenths of the business of the country was done on checks and credit. That is not true now. Fewer people are doing business with banks today than in many years prior to this time. A service charge is being entered against small accounts; this drives deposits away. Each check is taxed; this drives deposits away. Lack of confidence has caused many people to quit the banks. Not being able to secure credit, even on good security, has driven the people away from the banks. The banks were afraid to loan money because they already owed the people about 20 times as much as they had money to pay with. We have been suffering from a currency famine. Something must be done to put money all over this Nation so the people can put it in the banks and make depositors money safer and credit easier to obtain.

CURRENCY FAMINE—BANKS AND COUNTRY NEED MORE MONEY

If you were to close all the banks in America today and go into their vaults and take from those vaults every penny in them you would not find $45,000,000,000, the amount of money the banks owe the people on their deposits; no.

You would not find one half, or even one tenth, of that amount. You would find but $700,000,000, which is less than $1,000,000,000, and yet the banks owe the people $45,000,000,000 of deposits.

Can any institution on earth function efficiently and safely with so little money in proportion to such a large amount owed to the people who are doing business with these institutions? If you were to put $20,000,000,000 in circulation today, this money would go into the banks of this Nation. It would go into the small banks, the State banks, as well as the Federal Reserve banks. It would be used as a basis for additional credit and then they would not be doing business on such a slender shoestring that they would have to close up every time some large depositor threatened to withdraw his funds.

THE FUNDAMENTAL QUESTION

I am very glad that other people are interested in this money question. I think it is the question that will solve all others. It is the fundamental question, because money sets the price of everything. They tell you that the price of cotton and wheat is determined by the law of supply and demand. Yes; it is, taking into consideration the law of supply and demand of money as well as the law of supply and demand of wheat or cotton. Money controls the price of labor and controls the price of all commodities, and if you want to bring this country back I seriously urge your further consideration of this question.

Mr. TERRELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TERRELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question about the Government issuing money. The Government now issues a bond and pays interest on that bond. If it would issue the same amount in currency, without any interest, could it not redeem that money at a future time with the same taxes it has to levy in order to redeem the bond?

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT ISSUING MONEY AND INTEREST-BEARING BONDS

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is exactly right. Let me analyze the difference between them. If you issue money, that money will remain in circulation and nobody will be paying interest on it. It may be redeemed in the future with the same taxes that would redeem the bonds; it would not require so much in taxes, because no interest would be required on the money. No one, not even the Government, will be paying a penny of interest while the new money is outstanding. Money is an obligation of the United States Government, backed by the assets and taxing power of this Nation. All right; suppose you issue a Government bond. It is a noncirculating Government obligation. It is an interest-bearing obligation. The only difference is one is a bond, a noncirculating Government obligation, and the other is a circulating Government obligation; one bears interest and the other does not bear interest; and if one is safe and sound the other is safe and sound.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman know there is a bill before the Ways and Means Committee now to call in all Treasury bonds, all outstanding Liberty Loan bonds that have been issued since the war, with a direction to the Treasury to issue money to pay these bonds and save the Government $523,000,000?

Mr. PATMAN. I did not know that such a bill had been referred to that Committee. If such a bill is passed, it will save the Government $725,000,000 annually.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Would the gentleman be in favor of such a bill?

Mr. PATMAN. I shall be very glad to appear before the committee in support of such a bill. I believe that we have an unanswerable argument in favor of such a proposal.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. I have such a bill introduced.

Mr. PATMAN. I am thoroughly convinced that can be done. Why allow these banks to do business and owe the people $45,000,000,000 and only have $700,000,000 in cash to pay it with?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. They say they can go to the Federal Reserve and get more money, but they only have about $2,000,000,000 more there, so the amount is insignificant compared with the amount they owe the depositors. Only about one third of the banks do business with the Federal Reserve System; the other two thirds, including most State banks, have no connection with the Federal Reserve System. There is only one way for us to have a good, safe banking system in this country. Backed by the Government, as it is today, it is safe because the resources of this Nation are behind the banks through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; but whenever the Government releases its control, it should provide these banks with sufficient money to operate and do business on. If they do not, the people's money will not be safe in all of them, and we do not want that condition to occur again. [Applause.]

CREDIT OF NATION USED TO BENEFIT FOREIGNERS

Every day since January 1, 1932, and long prior to that time we have had outstanding in foreign countries from $228,000,000 to $300,000,000 in Federal Reserve banks obligations which are guaranteed by the United States Government. This money is based on goods stored in foreign countries or shipped between foreign points. The German merchant sells goods to a Japanese merchant, underselling the American exporter; he draws his draft payable in American dollars and delivers it to a Federal Reserve bank in America and receives Federal Reserve notes. The goods never touch the United States; they are sold in competition to American goods. We finance them because our international bankers make money out of such transactions by using the credit of this Nation free of charge. It is wrong and it should be stopped. It is bad enough for our own bankers to use the credit of this Nation without charge and doubly bad that foreigners are allowed to use it at all in competition with our own people.

INTERNATIONALISM

If international bankers are not restrained in their activities they will not only cause more economic hardships in this country but there is a probability that they will get our Nation into war to fight for what they conceive to be their rights in foreign countries. Now is the time to call a halt.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, about a week ago I appeared in the well of this House and laid before this body the condition of the city of Detroit. I said it was bad. I quoted some figures, but I made a mistake. I said there are 200,000 unemployed who are dependent solely upon welfare for their food and shelter. I made a mistake of just 100,000. I talked with the mayor of the city of Detroit this week and I find there are 300,000 people dependent upon public charity for their daily bread.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman has in his city of Detroit one who is known all over the country as a great philanthropist, Mr. Henry Ford. I am wondering how much he is subscribing to the relief and welfare work of the city of Detroit for the benefit of these people.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I cannot tell the gentleman how much Mr. Ford has subscribed, but I will say this to the gentleman from Illinois: While the other manufacturers were cutting wages, Henry Ford kept his up; while the other manufacturers were laying off men right and left, I believe he lost $50,000,000 keeping his plant open. Let me tell the gentleman that the people of Detroit admire Mr. Ford for many of the things he has done. We do have some manufacturers there that starve the people and crush them by paying starvation wages, and they are the people that I want to bring to the attention of this House.

I also want to bring to your attention the fact that on the 31st of March I wrote a letter to Mr. Jones, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. When the banks closed in Detroit there was $2,800,000 of public welfare or relief money in the banks, and here we are with the spectacle of the Government appointing a conservator of a bank, the Government running it, and having $2,800,000 of welfare money for the city of Detroit on deposit, and yet that money is tied up in the banks with a Government conservator in charge and the people starving.

The condition is getting desperate. I have just been informed over long-distance telephone that welfare workers are informing recipients of welfare that by Saturday of this week all aid will be discontinued unless Federal aid is granted to Detroit; and still the people of the city of Detroit cannot get the ear of the men in your Treasury Department or in your Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

RED MENACE HERE

You heard much discussion on the floor today of the red menace. The menace of communism is not in Russia but here. Hungry stomachs and emaciated children will make more Communists in a day in America than all Russia can make in 10 years.

I agree with the gentleman from New York that there is a red menace, but it is not the red menace of Russia. The red menace is here. If the starving people of the city of Detroit ever reach a state of despair you will have more menace in 1 day than Soviet Russia ever made in 10 years. [Applause.]

I wish my friend from New York, who is so interested in communism, would become interested in Wall Street. Then he will want to have an investigation of Wall Street. You have heard about all kinds of investigations of these calamities, such as the destruction of the Akron. This calamity that occurred the other day is not a drop in the bucket compared to the calamity caused by the breakdown of our economic system. Of course, I take my hat off to those heroes of the Akron, but I am more interested in the little children in our land who have been starving through no fault of their own. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks a letter that I wrote to Mr. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to which I have not yet received the courtesy of a reply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 31, 1933.

Mr. JESSE H. JONES,
Chairman Reconstruction Finance Corporation,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. JONES: I have just been informed by numerous citizens of the city of Detroit that due to the tying up of certain funds of the city, by the closing of banks, which were to have been used for welfare relief work, tens of thousands of men and women and children are actually suffering from lack of food.

Without taking any position and regardless of the banking situation of the city of Detroit, and without determining which group is right or wrong in the local fight concerning the reorganization of banks, I am asking you to become interested in the sorry plight of these numerous citizens of Detroit and to release immediately further moneys, to be deposited for the use and benefit of the city of Detroit so that it can carry out this relief work and keep the citizens from actual starvation.

This is no time to quibble. People are actually starving in Detroit. and I fear the consequences unless something is done immediately in the way of aid to these sorely distressed people.

If necessary, I think you should disregard all rules and regulations and red tape to release this money. Hungry mouths know no technicality. I implore you to assist me in this measure and to help our city immediately.

Will you kindly let me know if you can release money immediately? If you cannot release money now, will you give me your reason therefor; and lastly, if aid is not coming at this time, advise me when we may expect aid in Detroit.

My dear Mr. Jones, to bring the seriousness of this matter to you, you could probably realize the actual suffering and want if you and your children, in order to secure enough food to live on, were compelled to become a scavanger and travel from garbage pail to garbage pail as hundreds in our city are doing in Detroit today.

I therefore implore you to release money to the city of Detroit so our people may receive enough food to keep them from starving.

I am at your service.

Sincerely yours,

CARL M. WEIDEMAN,
Member of Congress.

CITY WORKERS KNOW WHAT REAL HUNGER IS

Mr. WEIDEMAN. You cannot realize these conditions. The conditions are too far away from Washington for you to realize it. Why, the farmers do not know what hunger is. All they have to do is to take the potatoes that they get from their land, from the pits, and go to their pork barrel and get their meat supply. The city worker is hungry when he is unemployed; he has no food reserve.

I asked the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to advance money to the city of Detroit that they have refused to let us use, but they will not advance it until the State appropriates money for the highway fund. The highway fund has been depleted, and we can do nothing. I am making this statement on the floor of the House so as to get it in the RECORD in the hope that it will reach them. All this Reconstruction Finance Corporation has to do is to release these moneys so that our people can get food and save them from actual starvation.

I hope the time will never come when these conditions will apply to their own families. If they do, God help them! [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, our good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], in the Seventy-first Congress was chairman of an investigating committee holding hearings for months in different parts of the United States to investigate communism and communistic activities in our country. I was with him, behind him and backing him in all that work. He now for the first time tells us here on the floor this morning that 2 years ago he read the investigation our Department of Justice made upon sabotage of the Akron. I have been wondering ever since he made that statement why he, as the chairman of that committee on investigation, has let 2 long years elapse without telling us about it. Why did he keep that information wrapped up in his bosom for 2 long years? I cannot understand it.

The gentleman does not have to go to the place where sabotage occurred on the Akron to find sabotage against the Government of the United States. It occurred right here in Washington recently on one of the Government buildings now being built by the taxpayers' money. The communists set fire to a Government building under construction here and caused damages running between $50,000 and $100,000 to it. Just what has been done to apprehend and punish them? We do not know now whether that building will ever be in first-class shape hereafter. We will spend lots of money to repair it, but there will always be a question mark there about whether or not we have safely repaired it. I want this Government to have facilities adequately sufficient to apprehend, confront, and capture every enemy of good government and punish him by law.

I took the floor, however, to answer my good friend from New York [Mr. BLACK], who criticized the passage of the bill put through here by the Judiciary Committee the other day, with only a few votes against it. The business here in the House is so voluminous that we Members must depend largely upon committees. When a responsible committee brings in a bill unanimously I take it for granted that it must be a good bill, until I have time to study it and find to the contrary.

I was here during the war. I saw Hal Flood, of Virginia, who was chairman of a big committee, bring in bill after bill on this floor and say, "There is an emergency for this bill, and we want you to take our word for it", and we voted for bill after bill of that kind just because of the confidence we had in Hal Flood and his committee.

Any Member could have gone to the Judiciary Committee and found out exactly what the committee knew about the measure. You can go to any committee and find out everything that the committee knows about a bill, if you have an inquiring mind and energy enough to do it.

Let me call attention to the personnel of the Committee on the Judiciary: HATTON W. SUMNERS, chairman; ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, a former Governor of Virginia; Judge MCKEOWN, of Oklahoma, who used to be on the circuit bench down there; Judge GORDON BROWNING, of Tennessee; EMANUEL CELLER, of New York; FRANK OLIVER, of New York; W. V. GREGORY, of Kentucky; MALCOLM C. TARVER, of Georgia; FRANCIS B. CONDON, of Rhode Island; ZEBULON WEAVER, of North Carolina; JOHN E. MILLER, of Arkansas; ARTHUR W. HEALEY, of Massachusetts; WARREN J. DUFFEY, of Ohio; JAMES E. RUFFIN, of Missouri; LAWRENCE LEWIS, of Colorado; and JOHN C. LEHR, of Michigan. They comprise the majority, or Democratic, members of the committee. Here are the minority, or Republican, members of the committee, all distinguished men: J. BANKS KURTZ, of Pennsylvania; CASSIUS C. DOWELL, of Iowa; RANDOLPH PERKINS, of New Jersey; JOSEPH L. HOOPER, of Michigan; U. S. GUYER, of Kansas; CLARENCE E. HANCOCK, of New York; JAMES M. BECK, a former Solicitor General of the United States, of Pennsylvania; and WILLIAM E. HESS, of Ohio. I deem such a committee a responsible one of the House.

That bill came upon this floor with the unanimous report from that committee—not a single line of protest against it, not a minority report against it. Should not Members have a right to presume that the bill was a good bill and was necessary when we were so assured by the committee? I voted for it because of my confidence in the personnel of that committee. We were not given time to make a personal investigation of it.

The largest committee in this House has 35 members. It is the only one of that number. The largest other committees have 25 members. I am here to say without fear of contradiction, concerning practically every bill that comes before the House, that there are not 10 percent of the Members of the House who know all about it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman think that we would have passed that bill if we had taken a little time to consider it?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know. I am not yet sure that it is a bad bill. I am one of those who are not absolutely controlled by the press. I am with the press when I think they are right, but I am against them when I think they are wrong. There has been a great howl from the press about this matter. Sometimes the press, in its zealous endeavor to put news before the country, obstructs justice. Is there a man in this House who will get up now and deny that the press obstructed justice in the Lindbergh kidnaping case?

If they could have just held back awhile, and have left Colonel Lindbergh unmolested and unhampered, there probably would have been justice done in that case immediately. They kept up such a stir and hurrah, and interposed obstacles in the way of those who were trying to bring the guilty to justice, that it was a great hindrance to justice, and not a help.

The President has not said this bill is a bad bill. All he said was, "I am against muzzling the press improperly." I am against muzzling the press. I am in favor of a free press and free speech, but there are times when it is necessary to muzzle the press. There are times when a judge on the bench has to call the members of the press in and say, "In this particular case I am going to have to ask you boys not to publish this proceeding." There are instances when that is necessary, and in most of those instances the press boys respond readily and act with accord. Sometimes they do not, and sometimes they get into trouble.

Is there a man here who will get up and deny that we must depend upon committees? Is there a man who will get up and say that more than 45 Members know all about every bill that comes before this House? No. Forty-five Members constitute 10 percent of our personnel. Not one of us will say that over 45 Members know all about the bills we pass. Therefore we must depend largely upon committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, apropos of what is being said here, I wish to discuss the importance of this House's being given an opportunity not only to deliberate but to offer amendments to propositions brought before it. Only 2 weeks ago we were urged to pass what is known as the "farm relief bill." To be exact, it was reported on the 20th, and under a suspension of the rules it was brought before this body on the 22d. We were told that the emergency was so great that if we delayed it for a day we were doing a great harm to someone somewhere.

We were told that the Administration was clamoring for it and demanding it. It was railroaded through. The point that I make is that our committee did this. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] talks about relying on the committees. This particular committee, the Committee on Agriculture, I understand, refused to hear any witnesses who came to this Capitol to be heard on the farm relief bill, save and except those who were in favor of it. That committee denied hearings to anyone else. It brought the measure in and it was passed under suspension of the rules, which denied to the Members of this body an opportunity to offer amendments. We were merely permitted to vote "yes" or "no" on the measure in the form in which it was presented, and then we were given that great privilege of extending our remarks in the RECORD. I say to you it is such procedure as this that makes this House ridiculous.

A great Georgian, Alexander Hamilton Stephens, on an occasion said that Monday was resolution and humbug day in the Congress of the United States, meaning the Lower House. I enlarge upon Mr. Stephens' statement. I say that every day, on which proceedings of the nature I am speaking about are had, is humbug day.

Let me call attention to this: The farm relief bill, which was so summarily rushed through this House, is still in the Senate. It has now been there over 2 weeks, and should it be amended, as it probably will be, it will be at least 3 weeks before the measure is returned to this House. I want to say that something is wrong with this parliamentary procedure. Either the House is unduly hasty in passing measures, or the Senate unduly retards their passage. I believe the Senate's procedure is correct.

I insist that this House should preserve its self-respect, and permit no committee, no matter what committee it may be, to bring a measure in here and say, "You have got to pass it as it is, without right of amendment."

Thank God, the Congress of the United States has one deliberative end where the rights of the people are recognized, where witnesses are heard, and where bills are discussed and amended. I would fear for this Republic if it were not for the Senate of the United States, where care is exercised in the passage of measures of this kind. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] has expired.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a telegraphic copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 4 of the Alaskan Territorial Legislature, adopted on the 3d day of April, with reference to House bill 2867, which is now H.R. 4557, concerning the 5-day week and 6-hour day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from Alaska?

There was no objection.

The telegraphic copy is as follows:

JUNEAU, ALASKA, April 4, 1933.

ANTHONY J. DIMOND,
Delegate from Alaska, Washington, D.C.:

The following memorial passed both houses unanimously today:

IN THE SENATE.

Senate Joint Memorial 4

By committee on mines, manufacturing, and labor

In the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, eleventh session

To the President of the United States, to the Congress, and to the Committees on Labor in the House and Senate of the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, has learned with consternation that Alaska is included in the provisions of a bill introduced into the Congress of the United States by Representative CONNERY known as "House bill No. 2867" and your memorialist respectfully represents:

That more than 95 percent of all laborers in Alaska are employed in seasonal occupations and that the average working hours for the year do not exceed 4 hours per day; that more than 25,000 of these laborers are engaged in the fishing industry, covering a coastal distance of more than 3,000 miles; that fishing operations in Alaskan waters are, by regulation of the Bureau of Fisheries, arbitrarily limited to a period less than 60 days for each season, which obliges the fishing industry to concentrate the year's effort within that short period, involving the production of some $50,000,000 worth of fishery products; that 80 percent or more of the revenues of the Territory are derived from the fishing industry; that many of the companies have operated at a loss for the past 2 years, and the enactment of the proposed legislation would compel them to discontinue operations, and the Territory of Alaska would be bankrupt and unable to support its schools, dependents, and indigent persons, and to continue other essential activities;

That more than 6,000 laborers are engaged in placer-mining industry in Alaska, covering an area of 590,000 square miles. This work is also seasonal and laborers are employed not more than 120 days during the year; most of the mining is carried on by individuals or small companies in isolated places who employ less than 10 persons each and it would be impossible for them to continue mining under the proposed schedule;

That the remaining wage-earners not exceeding 2,000 persons are engaged in lode mining and other industrial pursuits throughout this vast Territory and their employment does not exceed an average of 50 hours per week;

That workmen who are engaged in seasonal vocations will be deprived under the proposed law of the employment to make it possible for them to sustain themselves and their dependents and will be forced to leave the Territory and seek employment elsewhere;

That the extension of the proposed enactment to the Territory of Alaska would be ruinous to our industries, our canneries would be compelled to cease operations, most of our mines would be closed, unemployment would be greatly increased, and our Territory reduced to a state of bankruptcy and our people to want.

Now, therefore, your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in the eleventh regular session assembled, most humbly and respectfully petition and prays that the Territory of Alaska be exempted from the operations of House bill No. 2867 and all similar legislation limiting the hours or days during which any industry in Alaska may operate.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

ALLAN SHATTUCK, President of Senate.
JOS. MCDONALD, Speaker of House.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER

The legislative clerk (Mr. Frazier) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
April 7, 1933.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

KEY PITTMAN,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

PRINTING OF S. 158

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have S. 158, the bill which was passed on yesterday, printed in the form in which it was passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from Mr. George A. Hormel, of Minneapolis, who is the chairman of the board of directors of a large packing establishment, explaining his views with reference to the bill passed on yesterday and why it should apply to the packers, together with two articles prepared by Mr. Hormel substantiating his position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas in the chair). If there be no objection, the communication and articles will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The letter and articles are as follows:

APRIL 4, 1933.

Senator BLACK,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am taking the liberty of enclosing two papers on our unemployment situation, one of which was presented to the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief, Mr. Walter S. Gifford, director, on September 12, 1931.

I have studied the unemployment situation from the beginning and am convinced our Nation is suffering economic disorder because we as employers of labor did not reduce the hours for the measure of a day's work in line with the installation of labor-saving machinery.

I am chairman of the board of Geo. A. Hormel & Co., pork packers, Austin, Minn. The business was started in 1892 as a retail meat market and in the beginning employed three men. Today we have over 2,500 wage earners on our pay roll, and our product is available in nearly every port of the world.

During the development of the business my attention was centered mostly with the men in the plant rather than the men in the office. My success and the success of the business is mostly because of the contributions made by the wage earners in the plant who have devised efficiency methods and in most instances labor-saving machinery and technical handling that resulted in a quality product at a minimum of cost.

My contention is that business America is suffering economic collapse for the reason industry did not share prosperity with the wage earner. Industry did not step up the pay check in line with science and invention. The wage earner is entitled in a larger degree to the comforts and conveniences as well as leisure that invention has made possible.

There is nothing so vital at this time as unemployment relief. Our people have suffered to the limit of their endurance, and every effort should be made to put the 6-hour day into effect as early as possible and provide a minimum wage for men of not less than $5 and for women not less than $4, with time and a half for overtime. If I were on your committee, I would take off my coat and fight for a $6 minimum wage rather than a $5 minimum.

No man ever lived who had a greater opportunity than President Roosevelt to relieve suffering and distress, the equal of which was never experienced in the history of this country. The unemployed have suffered long. Our President and our Congress should concentrate on a movement that will put into effect your wonderful 6-hour-day measure which you are so courageously presenting to the Senate and the House. Buying power is the vital need. If the minimum pay is fixed at $4, our depression will drag along, but with a $5 minimum pay there is a chance for recovery.

When labor is fully employed, with a full pay check and money in circulation through all arteries of trade, it is like the healthy flow of blood through the veins of the human system; it will cure all ills; there will be no need for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; there will be no need for bonded issues; it will do more for farm relief than any act conflicting with the law of supply and demand.

It will be rather awkward for the packing business to adjust its schedule to 5 days a week because of the perishable character of the business, and I presume other lines will find it necessary to operate 6 days in the week, but this situation can be provided for.

In my paper, A Man-Made Depression, you will find my views regarding farm relief. If we work in harmony with the law of supply and demand and keep all departments of the Nation's business in balance, with labor fully employed, we will have continued prosperity.

I sincerely trust you will be successful in enacting the shorter-hour day into law. It will do more toward restoring prosperity and for the relief of the hungry and the oppressed than any other act. You deserve great credit for the effort you have made thus far, and I am sure there are fully 15,000,000 people, jobless now, who will be benefited within 3 months after the law is made effective.

I would appreciate very much receiving a copy of your bill.

Yours sincerely,

GEORGE A. HORMEL.

A MAN-MADE DEPRESSION

By George A. Hormel, chairman of the board, Geo. A. Hormel & Co.

The business leadership of America has failed us at a critical hour of need. We, as employers of labor, are responsible for the most colossal blunder of economic judgment in the history of modern business. At the hour when we were depending upon leadership higher up, there were developed, not measures to attack and overcome the fundamental causes of depression, but suggestions which by their very nature were temporary makeshifts. After much delay the recommendations of our great business leaders failed to provide relief or to establish any machinery which could hope to restore normalcy.

We have a man-made depression, a business man's panic, created by the leading business minds at the head of our American industries. And why? Because they would not adjust the working hours per day in line with the labor-saving machinery already in use. Because they did not make it possible to give every willing worker a job. Because they failed to recognize that buying power is and always will be necessary for business progress. Because in their program of reducing hours and sharing work they failed to include the maintenance of normal pay to support the 1929 and 1930 living standards.

All the big industrial minds knew that science and invention were supplying devices and labor-saving machinery which made it possible to provide the needs of our people with fewer men; that the readjustment period, where shorter hours were necessary, had arrived; that labor should be kept on the pay roll and buying power maintained. As early as 1929 economists were pointing out the large number of our workers then unemployed because of changes in technology or management. Our business leaders, although prompted by good motives, have nevertheless erred through their shortsightedness.

Continued buying power is the vital need for continued prosperity. Labor possesses the greatest spending power and the greatest investing power in the United States. It is stated 80 percent of automobile production would cease if wage earners did not buy automobiles. What is true of automobiles is true of the radio, electric washing machine, electric refrigerator, vacuum cleaner, and many other conveniences. The solution of our problem, then, must be to keep the wage earner at work with a pay check commensurate with our high standards of living.

When the President's Committee on Unemployment Relief was appointed in August 1931 there were but 7,000,000 unemployed persons, compared to more than 12,000,000 now. The committee's report, dated October 26 and 27, 1931, under recommendation no. 4, read in part as follows:

"The spreading of available work in industrial, commercial, and professional enterprises still is the most fruitful field for immediate unemployment relief. The committee, therefore, recommends that all work now available be equitably distributed among those normally employed in each unit of the various industries, both public and private, insofar as it is practicable to do so. This may be done either through a reduction in the number of days worked per week or hours worked per day. We are of the opinion that the genius and resourcefulness of the management and workers can find a way to apply the remedies herewith proposed."

The committee understood what the remedy was. What imaginary ills could have blinded them from putting into effect the recommendations which in their own minds they must have thought essential? Industrial brains seldom fail to correct irregularities as they occur in their own organization. Why should it have been impossible for business leaders to get together and develop a program to prevent destruction and distress to all departments of American business?

Had the share-the-work plan been made effective on that basis and normal pay maintained, the result would have been sufficient buying power to restore business in all lines. Our industrial minds admit that prosperity cannot return until labor is employed. They will not deny that a normal pay check will create normal buying power. Knowing what is required, why is there not constructive action taken? Is it possible our business minds are holding back for someone sufficiently outstanding among our giant industries to take the initiative?

Like a line of bricks standing on end, when industry chose to topple over the first brick by throwing labor on the unemployment list, it toppled over every brick in the economic structure of every department of business in our country. This threw industry into a period of cutthroat competition and price cutting which eliminated profits and caused the passing of dividends, thus further reducing buying power. Finally, commodity prices reached their record lows. Farm products are now the cheapest in a century. The farmer cannot pay interest or taxes, his farm securities have become worthless, and this has forced the closing of nearly 10,000 banks. There is nothing more destructive or which will create more distress and wreck the buying power of a community than the closing of a bank.

Some maintain that the stock-market crash is responsible for our present predicament. True, our country was drunk with speculation. Many were living by their wits; they had no special jobs, but when the crash came it precipitated this class down to earth. They mortgaged their homes, their cars, borrowed where they could, lost it all and were left, not alone without money but were in debt. This forced many job seekers on the market and as a result there were more persons on the unemployment list than our Government records would indicate.

The crash in 1929 temporarily paralyzed buying power, but conditions in all lines of business were never in better order. Our financial institutions carried nearly half the gold in the world; banks were receiving a high rate of interest and doing a profitable business. Our Government was functioning with finances sufficient in spite of an extravagant Congress. Our elevators were filled with a large surplus of products from the farm. How could business possibly wish for a sounder, more favorable background for continued prosperity?

Why should our people go hungry and suffer poverty when food is plentiful? Why should there be many wrecked fortunes and distressed businesses when the economic structure in every department of American business was never better?

The share-the-work plan is not constructive unless a fixed number of hours is established as the measure of a day's work and the number of working hours per day reduced so as to fully absorb the unemployed who are willing to work. The 6-hour day has been advocated by many for several years, but science and invention have been working overtime during this depression, and it is estimated practically 50 percent of the machinery now in our industries is obsolete. The question is, Will the 6-hour day now provide work for all the jobless? The present share-the-work plan will not retard the downward trend of business for the reason that the average pay check will provide little more than a meal ticket.

The reason the average pay check will provide little more than a meal ticket is that there are very few exceptions where the man who has a job is not supporting another member of the family who has no job but has a family, or perhaps some relative in distress is receiving assistance from his pay check. It is to be marveled that the jobless ones have not made some riotous demonstration before now. Their behavior reflects wonderful patience and the splendid character of our American people, and is the fruitage of our excellent institutions of education.

Too many of our business minds are of the opinion that we have come out of all other panics and somehow in some way we will get out of this. The panic of 1893 is cited. We depended upon the farmer's crop then. A good yield meant good business all along the line. We had an export demand for all the surplus the farmer produced. Our foreign shipments of packing-house products turned many millions back to the farmer. Our living standards were crude; little else was available aside from food, shelter, and clothing. Wages were from $1.25 to $1.50 per day—ample to supply our simple needs.

Our situation has improved. Our people are better educated; our standards of living have reached a higher level. Science and invention have provided many comforts and conveniences, the supplying of which has created many different fields of labor. We have reached a machine age which enables mankind to supply each other's requirements in a shorter-hour day. The comforts and conveniences at our command should be enjoyed by all our people, and this means a larger pay check. In line with the advent of the automobile the pay check was increased, and as other items of home comforts came on the market there were further increases, until during the period of prosperity we reached the highest scale of wages in the experience of our country. History shows industry prospered most when wages were the highest.

We have a hundred high-school graduates today to every 10 in 1893. We have more university graduates each year than all the rest of the world combined. This means higher efficiency and greater earning capacity per man for our industries, and is sufficient reason why the scale of wages should be higher now than it ever has been. Science and invention are intended to be a blessing to our country, not a curse.

It is repeated again, unemployment continues on the increase and buying power is daily decreasing under the share-the-work and wage-slashing plan. Because of the cut pay check there is no buying power for the newer industries, and they are forced to lay off more men. We will see industrial wrecks if we do not make a quick change to a fixed measure for a day's work on a basis that will return the unemployed to work and absorb the surplus men who have been forced back to the farm.

Some of our industrialists seem to think the 6-hour day with full 1929 pay is ruinous and in so many ways impossible, but in each instance one can see selfishness and greed cropping out. A recent article related President Harding's difficulty in pleading with Elbert H. Gary, then head of United States Steel Corporation, also with members of other steel industries, urging their adoption of the 8-hour day. The plea was opposed, sincerely but shortsightedly, in a conference with others of the leading industries, who argued it would be a calamity to American business, that the workmen themselves did not want shorter hours, that the change would disrupt all business, and that it would reduce possible output below the demand level because of added cost, etc. However, this article also stated that in less than 2 years the very steel firm which opposed the 8-hour day claimed it was the best thing that ever happened to industry and to our country in general.

The change from a 10-hour to an 8-hour day was made effective at the psychological time. It provided work for many veterans who had returned from overseas and was the real foundation for the prosperity we enjoyed following its adoption. Without the 8-hour day we would have had depression in place of prosperity. Wage earners were paying for their homes and buying for them the many conveniences and comforts that science and invention made available. Our citizens attained a higher standard of living than was ever enjoyed by the American people. The increased pay check created increased buying power, resulting in the longest period of prosperity in the history of our country.

During this period there was a happy relationship between employer and employee. Employers were liberal-minded and in many instances did many worthy acts for their employees. Profit-sharing plans for the workmen were in effect; different organizations provided for pensions, first-aid and hospital service, a plant doctor and visiting nurses, dining rooms and club rooms for employees, etc. It is reasonable to believe industry felt itself well repaid by the uplifting spirit created in the workmen, which in turn spelled "increased service."

But industry disrupted that happy relationship when it refused to share prosperity with the wage earner and destroyed with its left hand all the good it did with its right. The employer refused to divide the work among the workmen in line with the machines science and invention provided. It is claimed that from 1926 to 1931 production in the various lines of industry increased from 1 percent to as much as 84 percent, while the number of men employed decreased from 1 percent to more than 20 percent because of the many labor-saving machines.

While men were laid off and wages cut, American corporations paid during 1930 over $320,000,000 more in dividends than in 1929. This was in spite of a corporate net income decline of over 45 percent from 1929. In that year, then, our industries unwisely chose distribution of dividends rather than retention of labor on their pay rolls.

Then and there our industrial minds made the most serious blunder in the history of business and created the most hellish situation our country ever experienced. Laying off men and cutting their pay reduced buying power and started business down the toboggan, and it will continue going down until buying power is reestablished by employing the jobless with a normal pay check.

We are more nearly self-contained than any other nation, and we should put our house in order within our borders. We should balance every department of the Nation's business the same as every corporation must balance every department of its business. For instance, the automobile manufacturer will not build more wheels or more bodies than are required, but these departments are kept in balance with the departments manufacturing every other part of the automobile. In a like manner the agricultural department of our country's business should be kept in balance with the country's needs, which will put it on a supply-and-demand basis and place the farmer in a position to do a profitable business.

According to returns of the Census Bureau, the total land in cultivation in 1930 was over 62,000,000 acres more than the estimated total in 1925, and since 1930 it is reported the unemployed have been pouring out of the cities onto the farms at the rate of 1,740,000 a year. In 1925 industry had absorbed millions from the farm and brought them to the cities. This increased farm consumption and decreased farm production, and enabled the intelligent farmer to operate at a profit. Is it not logical when fixing the shorter-hour day we should not alone consider the unemployed in our cities but also the millions we have driven back to our farms?

American business is heavily burdened with income tax because our Congress and State legislators are spending many millions yearly to do "the impossible" legislating for farm relief, and the records show each year in place of relief the farmer's situation becomes more acute and distressing. No farm-relief plan can be effective that is not in harmony with the law of supply and demand.

The writer has spent most of his life in a farming community in the Middle West and is convinced that if half the fences were destroyed and the farmer permitted to operate on a larger scale the same as other lines of industry, and put into use modern machinery, such as the tractor, gangplow, gangdisks, ganghar-rows, and other devices for economic and more efficient farming, 50 percent of our farmers could produce all our needs at a lower cost, and do so at a profit. The uncultivated land could be used for pasture to raise our supply of cattle, hogs, and sheep. This is the only plan that will give us effective farm relief.

With the increase of machines there has been a steady increase of wealth for industry. The wage earner has not been benefited by invention; the wealth created by the machine has gone to the owners of the machine and there has been pronounced concentration of wealth in the hands of the few. According to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the total dividends paid in 1922 by all corporations was $930,000,000. Dividends paid in 1929 were $3,478,000,000, an increase of 356 percent.

The various big organizations conducting different lines of manufacture represent what 20 years ago were thousands of independent businesses in their respective lines. Many of our thinking people have begun to realize that the American citizen is at the mercy of the leaders of these large institutions who are supposed to take the initiative in correcting an irregular economic situation.

The researches of Professor Means, of Columbia, show that the 200 largest industrial and commercial corporations received in 1929 45 percent of all corporate income. These giant corporations controlled and continue to control at least 50 percent of all our industrial and commercial activity, and these corporations are really directed by not more than 400 "key men", business leaders. Why were not all of these drawn together and a common program formulated and real leadership established?

There is probably no industry that will have greater difficulty than the packing business in adjusting operations to a 6-hour day, but the writer will vote to inaugurate this program when other industries do the same. The Kellogg Breakfast Food Co. has operated on the 6-hour plan, changing their schedule from three 8-hour shifts to four 6-hour shifts. They have openly declared the change in every way satisfactory. Why should it not be successful in the steel mills, the telephone companies, the oil refineries, and other industries operating 24 hours per day?

Heroic measures should be adopted in getting each industrial, commercial, and financial unit to sign up for a 6-hour day with $5 minimum pay, to be effective on a fixed date. Our industries should cooperate with President Roosevelt and recommend that quick action be taken and that a proclamation go out naming the date.

The so-called "unemployment problem" never was a problem and is no problem today. We all know a shorter-hour day will put the jobless back to work. We all know a $4 minimum wage will create more buying power than a $3 minimum wage. We know a $5 minimum wage will create greater buying power than a $4 minimum wage. Where is the problem?

THE UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

The wage earner of our country has a higher intelligence than the same class in any other nation. They are better fed, better clothed, and live in better homes, most of them with all modern conveniences; because of this they are more efficient, have more energy, more initiative, and are more dependable than those in other lands.

When our workmen were given higher wages, their standard of living arose correspondingly and their requirements immediately became greater. The larger pay check made it possible for them to equip their homes little by little with all the modern comforts and conveniences.

This buying power made possible our great automobile industries; it made necessary the garages and repair shops all over our land; it made possible the tire industry, creating work for thousands. This same buying power made possible the industries manufacturing electric refrigerators, electric washing machines, the vacuum cleaner, the radio, and many other items that were not available 25 years ago.

We have more university graduates each year than all the rest of the world combined. Parents of the humbler class feel the need of higher education for their children, and the high-school graduates increase with each succeeding year.

This higher education is reflected in what has been accomplished in our various industries in the past 25 years in the way of inventions. Higher intelligence in our workshops is the reason for the many labor-saving machines that will do work better than by hand and at a greatly reduced cost.

With higher education, competition becomes keener and industry is constantly reaching out for labor-saving devices in order to lower costs to meet competitive prices. It also urges refinements that will produce a superior article, and as an incentive many industries give their men a premium in the way of employee's stock or have some plan of profitsharing for those who will think hard enough to bring about such improvements.

Most industries are now equipped with a research department. When college graduates receive their diplomas as electrical, chemical, mechanical, or construction engineers, they find positions in these various laboratories, where they unlock the storehouse of nature and give to the world the many blessings we now enjoy. In recent years the standard of intelligence available for industry has been on the increase; and as intelligence increases, science and invention make greater advances.

Is it fair to labor when a machine is invented, where 1 man operating it will do the work of 10, that 9 men should lose their jobs and, with their families, go hungry? If science and invention will reduce the working hours and supply all human needs, why is not labor entitled to more leisure and to all the comforts and conveniences that are the product of his brain?

It cannot be denied that a 6-hour day will give work to more than 5,000,000 people now unemployed. This can be readily accomplished if President Hoover will instruct the Relief Committee to call the captains of industry in convention and set a date when they shall all start together on a 6-hour schedule and all operate on an equal basis.

For example, 12,000,000 men working 8 hours a day equals 96,000,000 hours. If a 6-hour day is established, it will require 16,000,000 men to equal the same number of hours, or will provide work for 4,000,000 men now unemployed. Four million men with a pay check every week to spend for their daily requirements will set the wheels of industry in motion and prosperity would soon be restored.

Industry will shrink at the thought of reorganizing its working schedule and adjusting it to a 6-hour day. True, it is a stupendous undertaking, but nevertheless it can be done. When the 8-hour day with 10 hours' pay was established, most industries became hysterical; however, that change meant employment for over 4,000,000 men at that time who otherwise would have been on the unemployment list. If the truth were known, the 8-hour day with 10 hours' pay was the greatest contributing factor toward the prosperity we enjoyed following the change.

The American workman does not want dole; he wants work. There is no good reason why he should be humiliated by making him an object of charity. Labor is the medium through whose hands money must circulate. The more liberal we are with his pay, the more prosperous and happy our people will be. When labor is fully employed, he represents approximately 80 percent of the buying power of our country, and it depends on how well he is paid as to what extent all the newer industries will thrive.

With our present unemployment situation, buying power has been reduced to the extent that industry has been taxed to the straining point endeavoring to keep their organization together and in desperation one concern underprices the other for business, the result being insufficient earnings for dividends, and this further reduces buying power. If this situation is allowed to continue, who can picture the terrible disaster confronting us? It is inevitable there will be many business wrecks and in the last analysis, what will be the predicament of our great financial institutions?

The deposits in our banks are the greatest in the history of our country. We own half the gold in all the world, but the money is inactive. It is like a pool of water having neither inlet nor outlet; the longer it remains dormant the more stagnant and useless it becomes; but give this pool a fresh water inlet and an outlet, and it will soon become fresh and wholesome.

Give all the unemployed work by encouraging a 6-hour day and the pay checks of the wage earner will send money flowing into every avenue of trade, and becoming active will be a blessing to all mankind. This great buying power will set all the wheels of industry in motion.

Science and invention still continue to supply labor-saving machinery. It is inevitable that if the 6-hour day is established, it will not be long before a 4-hour day will be required, unless newer inventions, in turn creating newer industries, will take up the slack. This will mean working one shift 4 hours in the morning and another shift 4 hours in the afternoon.

GEORGE A. HORMEL.

(The writer submitted the above paper to the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief, Mr. Walter S. Gifford, director, on September 12, 1931.)

PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS IN GERMANY

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island. Both my colleague [Mr. HEBERT] and I have received this resolution.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, ETC.,
IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
January session, A.D. 1933.

Resolution expressing to Congress the protest of the State of Rhode Island against the atrocious demand of Adolf Hitler for the political and economic extermination of the Jewish people in Germany. (Approved Mar. 30, 1933)

Whereas on the hour of his appointment as Chancellor, Adolf Hitler has set forth a program of unremitting pressure for full Fascist control of the German Cabinet and firm enactment of the basic policies of the party—including expulsion, disenfranchisement, and expropriation of the Jewish people in Germany; and

Whereas this anti-Semitic hatred, not truly representative of the German spirit, is an insult not only to the Jews of Germany but to the Jews of the world as well, causing them to feel, however calmly and quietly they may await developments, that the Hitler action is one of the most tragic events in the long history of Jewish martyrdom: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island respectfully and earnestly pray the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in Congress to protest vigorously against this manifesto of the Nazi Party in Germany and the uncivilized and barbarous attack against the members of a race many of whom have added luster to the name of America; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state is authorized and directed to transmit duly certified copies of this resolution to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill, House bill 3835, and ask that it may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARRAN in the chair). The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 3835, the agricultural relief bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMERICAN CONSERVATION WEEK

Mr. WAGNER submitted the following concurrent resolution (S.Con.Res. 1), which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Whereas under the inspiring leadership of President Cleveland it became the settled policy of this Nation to conserve its natural resources; and

Whereas the establishment of an American conservation week will have the desired effect of bringing the American people to realize in the words of that great conservationist, President Roosevelt, that "the conservation of our natural resources and their proper use constitute the fundamental problem which underlies almost every other problem of our national life": Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is requested to issue each year a proclamation designating the first week in April as American conservation week and inviting the people of the United States to observe that week in schools, churches, museums, parks, and other suitable places, with ceremonies appropriate to the occasion.

RELIEF OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in pursuance of the suggestion which we had under consideration late on yesterday afternoon, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. SMITH] in charge of the unfinished business if he will consent to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily and let us proceed to the consideration of S. 1094?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is the bill which was under discussion last evening at the time of taking the recess?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; Senate bill 1094.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is asking that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1094. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before that is done I want it clearly understood that if this bill leads to extended debate then I am going to ask that we return to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is of such importance in view of the planting season that every day's delay makes the effect of the bill, if it shall have one, more imperative than ever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the rule of the Senate to be that if at any time a Senator demands the regular order, then the bill under consideration will be displaced and the regular order will be proceeded with, that is, in this case, the consideration of the farm bill. Any Senator has a right at any time to demand the regular order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that conforms to the rule unquestionably, but may I ask that the bill may be reported in order that we may understand its general purpose?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the continuance of the existing emergency heretofore recognized by Public No. 1 of the Seventy-third Congress or until this act shall be declared no longer operative by proclamation of the President, and notwithstanding any other provision of any other law, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, any insurance company of any State of the United States is in need of funds for capital purposes either in connection with the organization of such company or otherwise, he may, with the approval of the President, request the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock of any class, exempt from assessment or additional liability, in such insurance company, or to make loans secured by such stock as collateral, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may comply with such request. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, sell in the open market the whole or any part of the preferred stock of any such insurance company acquired by the corporation pursuant to this section. The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by—

At this point, on page 2, line 17, the committee proposes to strike out the words "an amount sufficient" and to insert "$100,000,000 in order to provide funds"——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not yet under consideration. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given that the bill be read, and the clerk will read the bill.

The reading of the bill as originally introduced was resumed and concluded, being entire, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the continuance of existing emergency heretofore recognized by Public No. 1 of the Seventy-third Congress or until this act shall be declared no longer operative by proclamation of the President, and notwithstanding any other provision of any other law, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, any insurance company of any State of the United States is in need of funds for capital purposes either in connection with the organization of such company or otherwise, he may, with the approval of the President, request the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock of any class, exempt from assessment or additional liability, in such insurance company, or to make loans secured by such stock as collateral, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may comply with such request. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, sell in the open market the whole or any part of the preferred stock of any such insurance company acquired by the corporation pursuant to this section. The amount of notes, bonds, debentures, and other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue and to have outstanding at any one time under existing law is hereby increased by an amount sufficient to carry out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 2. In the event that any such insurance company shall be incorporated under the laws of any State which does not permit it to issue preferred stock, exempt from assessment or additional liability, or if such laws permit such issue of preferred stock only by unanimous consent of stockholders, or upon notice of more than 20 days, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized for the purposes of this act to purchase the legally issued notes, bonds, or debentures of such insurance company, which may be subordinated in whole or in part or to any degree to claims of other creditors.

SEC. 3. As used in this act the term "insurance company" shall include any corporation engaged in the business of insurance, irrespective of the nature thereof, and operating under the supervision of a State superintendent or department of insurance in any of the States of the United States.

SEC. 4. The right to alter or amend or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person, firm, association, or corporation, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to such other person, persons, firm, association, or corporation, shall not be affected thereby.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the Senator from Florida what great emergency there is requiring the immediate passage of this bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation requests its passage and they claim that there is a pressing need for it. They want to consider some applications of insurance companies that are pending and wish to dispose of them, under the authority of the bill. There is, I take it, beyond doubt, a real need for the enactment of the measure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I suppose we are to assume from merely glancing at the bill that it is proposed to grant $100,000,000 to the insurance companies of the country. I think the Senate ought to know something about the bill before we arrange to make loans in these figures. I think there ought to be an explanation of the bill. In any event, I do not know anything about it except what I have read in the measure itself.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a very simple bill, and I shall be glad to explain it very briefly, if the Senator so desires.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Unless there is some special reason for the passage of this measure, I think the farm bill is of vastly more importance to the country right now than any bill to provide for loaning money to insurance companies, which, according to all the information I have been able to get, are pretty well able to take care of themselves.

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly some of them are, but there are a good many in the country, as the Senator knows, and some of them need help.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. They are sufficiently able to take care of themselves as that they have been able to increase the salaries of their executive officers to enormous proportions. I know the bill proposes to limit the salaries of such officers to $17,500, but I think they are mostly State insurance companies, judging from the way the bill reads. I think, however, that the farm bill is vastly more important at this moment. So, Mr. President, unless there is some special emergency that has not thus far been shown for the necessity of this measure, I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has been represented to the committee that there is a special emergency, and either the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should have the authority now or they might as well not have it at all. There is some real need for it.

The Senator from Indiana will note from the report that—

The bill authorizes the Reconstruction Finance Corporation during the emergency declared by the President on March 6, 1933, or until the provisions of the bill are declared inoperative by proclamation of the President, to subscribe for preferred stock of insurance companies which is exempt from assessment or additional liability, or to make loans to such companies secured by such stock as collateral whenever the Secretary of the Treasury finds that such subscriptions or loans are necessary to provide working capital for such companies. Such subscriptions or loans are to be made upon request of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President.

The amendment, I think, takes care of the very valuable suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana on yesterday.

The bill as reported by the committee also limits the amount of the preferred stock, notes, bonds, or debentures of any one insurance company which may be subscribed for, purchased, or accepted as collateral for loans, by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to the amount of the new capital furnished by the applicant company. A provision is also added prohibiting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from making any such subscription, purchase, or acceptance with respect to any insurance company which pays any of its officers, directors, or employees a compensation in excess of $17,500 a year, and it requires the company to agree not to increase the compensation of any officers, directors, or employees, and not to retire any of its stock, notes, bonds, or debentures issued for capital purposes, during the time any of its securities are held by the Corporation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. For the moment, until I can learn more about the bill, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SMITH. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will report the committee amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 1, after the enacting clause, to insert the heading:

Title I—Agricultural adjustment: Declaration of emergency.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 6, after the word "of", to insert "title I of", so as to make the section read:

That the present acute economic emergency being in part the consequence of a severe and increasing disparity between the prices of agricultural and other commodities, which disparity has largely destroyed the purchasing power of farmers for industrial products, has broken down the orderly exchange of commodities, and has seriously impaired the agricultural assets supporting the national credit structure, it is hereby declared that these conditions in the basic industry of agriculture have affected transactions in agricultural commodities with a national public interest, have burdened and obstructed the normal currents of commerce in such commodities, and render imperative the immediate enactment of title I of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 16, after the word "the", to strike out "pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914; and" and insert "base period. The base period in the case of all agricultural commodities except tobacco shall be the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914. In the case of tobacco, the base period shall be the post-war period, September 1919–August 1928", so as to make the section read:

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress—

(1) To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy, equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period. The base period in the case of all agricultural commodities except tobacco shall be the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914. In the case of tobacco, the base period shall be the post-war period, September 1919–August 1928.

(2) To approach such equality of purchasing power by gradual correction of the present inequalities therein at as rapid a rate as is deemed feasible in view of the current consumptive demand in domestic and foreign markets.

(3) To protect the consumers' interest by readjusting farm production at such level as will not increase the percentage of the consumers' retail expenditures for agricultural commodities, or products derived therefrom, which is returned to the farmer, above the percentage which was returned to the farmer in the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to agreeing to the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will report the next amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not want this bill to be run through in this manner. I should like to have the Senator from South Carolina give us information on the bill before we vote on the amendments.

Mr. SMITH. I thought, perhaps, that after we had gone through the committee amendments, then I would take the floor and make a general explanation of the different titles and of the amendments.

Mr. FESS. I would much prefer that the Senator give us the explanation now, because there may be some amendments which everybody would favor; and, on the other hand, there may be some controversial points in other amendments.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, then I will undertake before the bill is read for committee amendments to give an explanation of the different parts and titles of the bill without comment, except as the text appears.

The first part of the bill is the declaration of purpose.

The first important amendment is, on page 2, line 17, with reference to which let me say that the base period originally accepted as to all the commodities included in the bill was that from 1909 to 1914, inclusive, a 5-year period. That base period was fixed upon the assumption that the relation between the prices of the things the farmers have to buy and those that they have to sell was about as nearly equitable during that period as at any other period which might be selected. In other words, during that period the purchasing power of farm commodities as compared with the price of commodities the farmer had to buy was approximately 100.

It was found, however, that the base period for the major part of the tobacco produced and cured in this country did not correspond to the base period for other commodities. In other words, the purchasing power of tobacco during the base period 1909 to 1914 showed a difference of several percent as compared to the price of things the producers of tobacco had to buy. So, after consultation with the tobacco growers producing several varieties, it was found that the conditions obtaining during base period indicated in this amendment, namely from 1919 to 1928, more nearly conformed to those obtaining in the base period of 1909 to 1914 as affecting other commodities. It was found that the prices received for tobacco during the base period fixed for tobacco were just about at the level of the prices of other commodities during the period from 1909 to 1914.

Mr. FESS. As to all commodities except tobacco the base period would be that from 1909 to 1914.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; except in the case of tobacco; and as to tobacco it was found that the period from 1919 to 1928 about conformed, so far as the purchasing power of tobacco compared to the price of the things the farmer has to purchase is concerned, to the period from 1909 to 1914 in the case of other commodities.

Mr. FESS. How does the Senator account for that? Why is that true?

Mr. SMITH. During the years from 1909 to 1914 in certain grades and kinds of tobacco there was perhaps a surplus. Anyway, the average price of tobacco at that time, taking fire-cured, flue-cured, and shade-cured tobacco, was really below in purchasing power the price of the articles the producer had to buy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There has been a marvelous increase in the consumption of tobacco since the pre-war period, which alters the relationship of tobacco prices to other prices. That increase has been due to the consumption of cigarettes. For illustration, during the pre-war years only about 5 or 6 percent of the combined domestic consumption of flue-cured Burley and Maryland tobaccos went into cigarettes, while in recent years cigarettes have consumed from 50 to 60 percent of the tobaccos of these types. That makes it appear clearly that the pre-war period, which is taken as the base period for other commodities, would not be applicable to present conditions relating to the use through the consumption of tobacco.

Mr. FESS. And this is the basis of mere exchange value of one thing as measured in the purchasing power of the other.

Mr. SMITH. It is merely the exchange parity, as it is called.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator. I could not understand why one base period should be taken for one commodity and another base period for another.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I make a point of order. There is absolutely no order in the Chamber, and I am unable to hear anything that is going on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I simply desire to suggest that the period 1909–14 was about the lowest-price period for tobacco for many, many years. The tobacco farmers were without any organization, and the price had been beaten down until it was below the cost of production. Soon after 1914 there were several organizations that had a tendency to bring up the price, and then the increased use of cigarettes called for a much greater demand for tobacco, until the price went up considerably. If this bill is made to apply to tobacco on the basis of the years 1909–14, it would not help tobacco at all, but I think probably it would injure the tobacco growers instead of helping them.

Mr. SMITH. I will say to the Senator that upon investigation it was found that if the average price of tobacco between 1909 and 1914 were accepted the tobacco growers would get less than they are getting now.

Mr. LOGAN. They would get less than they are getting at this time, and at this time they are not getting the cost of production.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is referring to a fairly fixed base period upon which these computations shall be made. Would it be correct to say that in part 3 of title I, that being the part of the bill relating to cost of production, and so forth, there is the option in the Secretary of Agriculture of a veto upon all of the preceding sections of the bill, including this base period?

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me to do so, I will come to that in my discussion of the bill and the various parts of it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did not mean to anticipate the Senator in that respect. I simply wanted to know fundamentally whether the sections which he is now discussing are not all subject to a subsequent veto under part 3 of title I.

Mr. SMITH. I would not say "subject to a veto." It is left to the Secretary's choice which one of the three principles involved in this bill shall be accepted by him. When one of those principles is accepted, of course the others will be eliminated.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from South Carolina has stated, and others have endorsed the statement, that the reason why the base period in the case of tobacco is changed from the general base period is because of the low price of tobacco during that general base period. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Is it not true, too, that milk was at a very low price during this general base period?

Mr. SMITH. The committee had no information to that effect. I desire to state to the Senate that, contrary to the general sentiment, the Senate committee did have hearings. They secured, as nearly as might be under the circumstances, the views of those who represented the major part of the products included in this bill; and we heard no complaint as to the base period with reference to milk and its products.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to say, Mr. President, that my purpose in raising the question here is to put the milk people on notice that if I am correct the general base period fixed here is a period when the price of milk was very low. Exactly the same condition prevailed in the milk industry in the base-period year as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] with reference to tobacco.

Mr. SMITH. I will suggest to the Senator from New York that after I have discussed the different features of this bill, the principles involved, and after the amendments proposed by the Senate committee have been either adopted or rejected, and the measure is open to amendment, the Senator may prepare and present such amendments as he thinks are germane or necessary.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will bear with me to say this much more, I am purposely putting in the RECORD what I am saying here in order that the dairy interests may be warned that if the theory I hold is correct this bill will tend to make dairy products very much cheaper and lower than they are now, and the dairy farmers will not be benefited by the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator passes from the discussion of the base period will he bear with me just a moment to make a suggestion about dark-fired tobacco?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see, on page 2, that—

> The base period in the case of all agricultural commodities except tobacco shall be the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914.

I am informed that there is quite a difference between other kinds of tobacco and dark-fired tobacco, and that that ought to be restored to 1909–14 as to dark-fired tobacco. Would the Senator have any objection to an amendment excepting dark-fired tobacco from that limitation?

Mr. SMITH. I am not advised as to how the dark-fired tobacco in the period accepted as the base period for the other commodities compares with the base period accepted here for tobacco. I have been informed by telegrams and by the statements of individuals that the dark-fired tobacco, which is peculiarly cured, will not be greatly benefited, if benefited at all, by the period indicated; and I do not know, as to the administration of the bill, just what difficulties might occur in excepting dark-fired tobacco. I suggest to the Senator that as this matter is now before the Senate, it might be very well for him to offer his amendment now, because after the Senate once accepted it there would have to be a reconsideration of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is this particular amendment now before the Senate for action?

Mr. SMITH. The particular Senate committee amendment is now on its passage.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will prepare an amendment and offer it in accordance with the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. SMITH. I ask that that amendment go over.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood that that amendment was adopted a while ago.

Mr. SMITH. That is not my understanding. Was it adopted, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been adopted; but, if desired, it will be reconsidered, under the parliamentary practice.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I make a request? I ask unanimous consent that the chairman be allowed first to explain the different principles in this bill, and then that we take up the bill for action on the Senate committee amendments, and then proceed, and that we consider the amendment that has been adopted as yet to be adopted.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. Just one question. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he is entirely sure that he can explain, so that we can understand them, the different principles in this bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. No, sir. I am going to read the bill and tell what it makes an assault with intent to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has asked unanimous consent not to be interrupted until he has finished his speech. The Chair will state that it is within the power of the Senator not to yield if he so desires.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not understand at all that the Senator has requested not to be interrupted.

Mr. SMITH. Let me repeat my request: That we reconsider, if necessary, the vote by which the first Senate committee amendment was adopted. If that can be done without reconsidering it, by unanimous consent, I ask then that the chairman first be permitted to make a statement as to the principles of the bill, and then that we start with the Senate committee amendments and take them up in order. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to make his address on the bill before taking up the committee amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator please wait until the Chair states what he understood the Senator to ask? The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to make his speech on the whole bill before the Senate takes up the committee amendments.

Mr. WAGNER and Mr. McNARY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor, and he can proceed and speak without interruption until he is through. Until he is through no other matter may be taken up.

Mr. SMITH. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, reserving my right to object, I ask the Senator to yield for a very simple question.

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from New York does not direct himself to the provisions of the bill. I do not want the Senator from South Carolina to be apprehensive about that.

The Senator from South Carolina intends to deal only with the so-called "farm bill", and does not, in his discussion or in seeking action by the Senate, intend to deal with the farm-mortgage part of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to have members of the Banking and Currency Committee explain their idea in reference to the mortgage feature that is incorporated in the bill. I have attached to the report upon the bill an analysis prepared by those who drafted the bill and sent it down to our committee. The author of the bill made a synopsis of its provisions, which I incorporated in the report without any comment whatever, thinking that his comment was sufficient to enlighten the Senate as to what it is proposed to do.

Mr. WAGNER. But I was seeking information as to how the Senator from South Carolina intends to proceed. Is it the Senator's idea that we ought to dispose altogether of the farm bill first, before taking up the so-called "farm mortgage bill"?

Mr. SMITH. That is what I propose to do.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that, in my opinion, the proper procedure in that respect would be that when we reach page 27, title II, of the pending bill, we would be able to offer as a substitute for title II Senate bill 1110, introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, on which they held hearings. The full committee has considered that bill and reported it back here as Order of Business No. 18 on the calendar. We will move to substitute for title II of the pending bill this bill reported by the Banking and Currency Committee. It contains very much the same substance that the bill now before the Senate contains, but with some amendments which I think improve it; and we will ask to have it substituted for title II of this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, under the rules of the Senate, it will be in order to offer it as a substitute for what the Agricultural Committee has put in. However, I shall confine myself now to a discussion of the principles that are found in what is known as the "farm relief bill", as contradistinguished from the mortgage bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Quite the logical course to be followed in the consideration of legislative bills, as contradistinguished from appropriation bills, is for the discussion to proceed before the consideration of committee amendments, as the Senator knows. I suggest to the Senator that he start in with title I, then go to titles II, III, and IV, give his description of them, and then that we take up the amendments.

Mr. SMITH. That is precisely what I have said the chairman of the committee proposed to do. I will take up the bill by titles and try to explain them, and then we will take up the amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is right.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, every Member of the Senate is familiar with the declaration of policy. It is not necessary for me to read or discuss that.

Part I of the bill, under the amendment, is in effect a bill which has already been passed by the Senate. It is known as the cotton option or the cotton substitution bill, which I introduced, which passed the Senate and passed the House, but failed of signature by President Hoover. That bill simply provides that the cotton owned and controlled now by the Government shall be substituted, at the present price, to farmers producing cotton, in lieu of production, to the extent of the cotton held by the Government, the farmers entering into contracts that they will reduce their production exactly in the percentage of the cotton held by the Government on which they take their option. There are something like two million and a half bales of such cotton. The Government has it, it has not disposed of it, and there is an enormous surplus. If the Government should undertake to dispose of it now, as a matter of course that would have a depressing or a bearish effect on the market.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a practical question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The farmers contract to reduce in the amount they purchase from the Board. My question is, When is the cotton-planting season?

Mr. SMITH. It is on now, and in parts of the country the planting is very extensive. Between now and the 15th of May the cotton crop of the United States will have been planted. I will state, for the information of the Senator, that the planting per se is a very simple and inexpensive process, and if this bill should be enacted and this Government cotton be made available for distribution in lieu of production, it would be very readily availed of, even by those who have planted their cotton, because it would be much more profitable to accept the cotton at the present price in consideration of that percentage of reduction, rather than go on and cultivate, fight the insects, pick the cotton, and gin it, because the price is now anywhere from 5 to 6 cents a pound below the cost of production.

Part I simply provides that the Government may, through the agencies of the crop-production force that is now in the field, the Extension Service, and the agents they have there, take contracts from the individual farmers that they will reduce production in the exact proportion in which they take cotton out of that held by the Government.

What would be the effect? There are about 2½ million bales held by the Government. There is a surplus of something like 6,000,000 bales of cotton in the United States. The total world surplus of American cotton is around 13,000,000 bales. The consumption of American cotton by the world is about 13,000,000 bales. So that there is in actual, physical existence today practically a world's supply of American cotton, even though we did not produce any in the United States this year. In other words, there are 13,000,000 bales which will be carried over August 1, when the new cotton starts coming in.

The purpose of this part of the bill, along with the other features of the bill, which I will explain, is to take 2½ million bales already in existence, at a price below the cost of production, owned by the Government, and substitute it for production, the Government holding the cotton to guarantee performance of the contract. Then there will be a reduction of at least 2½ million bales in prospective production, and a decrease of 2½ million in the surplus. That will reduce both ways. Besides that, it will give the producer whatever percentage of his crop he elects to take of this already produced, that much cotton, certainly, below the cost of production, which will not cost him a penny, and which may enable the Government to dispose of it in that way without depressing the market. In fact, it will result in raising the market, because they will have reduced the surplus 2½ million bales, and reduced production 2½ million bales. The farm production loans are made only upon the promise and contract that the farmers will reduce this year's production 30 percent under last year's, and the regional Agricultural Credit Corporation also requires a reduction of at least 30 percent, and through these three methods the possibility is that our prospective crop, the crop of 1933, will be so reduced that the carry-over will not exceed the normal carry-over, which must be between two and three million bales.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I esteem the Senator to be a very high authority on the subject of cotton culture. He makes a very clear explanation of section 1. Is it the opinion of the Senator that his purposes, and the purposes manifest in section 1, would apply to the crop of 1933?

Mr. SMITH. Undoubtedly. If the Senator will pardon me for using myself as an illustration, I may say that I plant cotton. We have now learned to top-dress the cotton at the time of planting more than to fertilize it, and the planting process is very simple. If I could get the equivalent of my entire prospective output of this year out of this Government cotton, if this bill should become a law, I would infinitely rather plant my land, already prepared for cotton, in some other soil builder or in some other crop which might enable me to take care of my plantation. I would be perfectly willing to let it lie idle rather than plant it and run the risk of producing another crop to pile up on the surplus which already exists when I could buy the amount of my crop for from 5 to 6 cents a pound below the cost of production and get rid of the expense caused by the exigencies of the season and the ravages of the weevil, and avoid the uncertainty of the price, which necessarily must come with the production of another crop. I think it would apply practically throughout the Cotton Belt. So much for part I.

Part II is more complex. There are two provisions in part II. One is the proposition of leasing the land from the farmer and for the Government to pay him for the land thus leased. The process by which that has to be accomplished is to lay a tax on the processors of farm products in order to raise a sum sufficient to eliminate in 1933 enough acreage to reduce the production to where it will eliminate, as far as may be, the surplus and to reduce the production to within domestic consumption.

It is proposed to lay a tax on lands under cultivation producing these crops. The amount of the tax is not indicated in the bill, but I presume the object of the Secretary of Agriculture is to collect a fund sufficiently large to rent or lease lands from the producers at a rental which would be enticing to the landowner.

The question has been raised in the committee, and doubtless will be raised here, Is it proposed, if this principle is put into operation, to lease the marginal lands, the less-productive lands, the lands which are already out of cultivation, such lands as the land banks, the insurance companies, and mortgage holders have been unable to dispose of, upon which they have foreclosed their mortgages, and which they cannot rent for a sufficient amount to pay the interest on the mortgage, or the taxes? Millions of acres of that kind of land, I understand, are now lying idle. But there are estimated to be 350,000,000 acres of arable lands, farm land, in the United States. The proposition, as I understand it, is to eliminate out of the 350,000,000 acres, or so much of it as is in actual cultivation, fifty to sixty million acres of land. Therefore, the taxes laid upon the processing would be in an amount sufficient to lease 60,000,000 acres of land at an acreage rental to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. President, as this bill was drafted, as I understand, in the Department of Agriculture, and sent here almost as it now appears, I presume that the Secretary of Agriculture would not attempt to lease lands that were owned and controlled by these corporations which are already out of production. Nor would they rent what are known as "marginal" or "negligible" lands, those which produce the least, but would attempt to lease those productive lands which are now planted to the staple crops indicated in the bill. There would be a processing tax laid upon all the processors of farm products in order to raise a sufficient amount of money to induce the landowners to lease those lands.

In addition to that, another complaint was made before the committee. Take, for instance, a cotton producer. Suppose he were willing to lease 25 or 30 or 40 percent of his land to the Government. Then would he be allowed to plant other crops, which would come in competition with or increase the volume of the other crops indicated in the bill, the production of which we are also seeking to reduce? Therefore the bill provided that where lands were thus leased, the owner of such lands would not be allowed to plant such crops as would find a market and come in competition wth other staple agricultural products, but he would be allowed to plant these staple products if for his own consumption on his place.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Are we not embarrassed in not knowing what is likely to be done and what can be done? Is not that one of the weaknesses of the bill? The Senator just stated that we do not know what is going to be done, and it seems to me that it is very obvious that we do not know what is going to be done.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, all I can say to the Senator from Ohio is that the committee, after deliberation, and having present those who represented the authors of the bill, seemed to think that, as it is an experiment, as it must be tried out, it must be left to the Secretary of Agriculture to proclaim as soon as possible a statement of just what would be the positive factors under the principles I am attempting to describe.

Mr. President, I think we all understand what the proposition is as to leasing. Now we come to the feature known as "the allotment plan." That plan takes as a basis of calculation for the parity the farmer should enjoy at the present time, that which existed between 1909 and 1914.

Remember, it does not mean the prices obtaining then, but the parity that existed then. The purchasing power of farm products might be brought up to where the farm dollar will buy the same amount of commodities the farmer wants to buy now that it did in the period selected, to be known as the "base period." I understand the method by which this is to be done is as follows: There is to be laid upon the processor a tax, which tax, levied and collected from him and added to the farm price, shall raise that farm price to the parity that existed in the base period selected.

The processor is to be the first that manufactures the commodity after it leaves the farmer in the raw state. For instance, the miller of wheat must bear the difference between the present price of wheat and the parity price. There will be a tax levied upon him for the difference. That difference will be confined, of course, to the part of the product domestically consumed. Whatever percent of a given farm commodity is exported, of course, will have to suffer the export price. The parity the farmer will get will be only that applied to the part domestically consumed.

In all fairness it ought to be stated that an attempt will not be made at once to put the entire tax into operation, but it will be so graduated as to find out just what the consumer will take at the advanced price, just what effect the raise of the price on one commodity may have on something that would be substituted, and what the general consuming public would be able to take at the advanced price. The Secretary of Agriculture is given the power to raise or to lower this tax from time to time, under certain conditions, as he may see fit. The processor, of course, is given a certain length of time in which to adjust his business to the new order of things.

As I understand, when an individual farmer brings his cotton or wheat to market he will be given the market price by the first or local buyer. He will take that amount of wheat or cotton to the agent at his county seat. That agent will estimate what proportion of it will be domestically consumed and what percent will be exported. The farmer is then given a certificate or a slip indicating what will be paid him on that percentage of his product domestically consumed when collected by the agent from the processor. Just what time that will take or what will be the result I am simply leaving to the imagination of the Senate to understand. I hope that any member of the committee who thinks I am not giving as nearly as may be the terms of the bill will rise and correct me, because I have given very careful and earnest study to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. My purpose in rising is, of course, not to venture to correct the Senator, but to inquire whether it is the purpose of the bill, out of the tax imposed upon processors, to pay the owners of basic agricultural commodities bounties which will raise the prices of such agricultural commodities to the respective prices of the base periods?

Mr. SMITH. That is my interpretation of the bill. As I said a moment ago, that, of course, I presume is not contemplated to be done at once, but gradually, taking into consideration the things which I just enumerated, such as the amount of unemployment, which is really to be contemplated, the consumptive power of the public, and the general effect of the raise in price upon the consumption or the substitution of other articles. I should explain in this connection that provision is made in the bill that where a substitute is being used because of the rise in price of any article enumerated therein, that substitute may be taxed in proportion as the original article for which it is being substituted.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I further ask the Senator whether it is intended that the taxes on processors shall be consolidated so that any benefit payments made under the bill—any bounties on farm commodities, as I prefer to term them—may be paid out of the aggregate taxes collected?

Mr. SMITH. There is nothing in the bill to indicate an answer to that question. It is my opinion, gathered from my conversations with those who are more intimately connected with the bill than I am, that each commodity should be taxed to take care of the parity between that commodity and its price.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I assume the Senator's statement means that he so construes it—and if he does, I agree with him—that there is nothing in the bill requiring a segregation of the processing tax for application to any particular commodity. In other words, it all goes into one fund, but the distribution of it is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH. As I indicated, there was no decision as to whether the tax collected should all be put into one pool and then the bounty or tax or equalization fee, or whatever it may be called, to the farmer, shall be taken out of the entire amount or whether, for instance, whatever tax is collected on wheat shall be used to pay for wheat, and so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is correct about that. It would be for regulation by the Secretary. I would like to ask the Senator if it was not generally understood that the Secretary in making his regulations would certainly not take the processing tax on one commodity to pay for raising the price of a different commodity?

Mr. SMITH. I indicated that.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to make that plain. Nobody contemplated that.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no; it was not so contemplated.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody contemplates that the Secretary would use the processing tax on wheat, for instance, to pay the producer of cotton, or vice versa.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether there is any provision in the bill which expresses such a statutory intent, as distinguished from the intent of legislators?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not. I think when we studied it, as the committee had to do, it resolved itself into the fact that the power conferred upon the Secretary is something new, and the committee was anxious not to circumscribe him or limit him in the exercise of the discretion; but nobody contemplates that he would do as has been suggested he might technically do under the law.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the Senator from South Carolina will yield further, may I ask on what principle the basic agricultural commodities specified in section 11 of the bill, on page 16, were selected?

Mr. SMITH. I have no way of answering that question. The articles specified in the bill, as I understand, were agreed upon in the Department of Agriculture and were sent down as we find them now. So far as the chairman of the committee is concerned, and I think I speak for the committee, I do not think there was any specific reason given why the particular articles herein included were selected from all the number except that they were more generally considered staple among perishable products. That is about as far as I am able to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator on that point?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator will agree with me that one of the difficult things to provide in legislation of this kind, either by those who drew the bill or by the committee or by the Senate itself, is to decide what basic agricultural products should be included. The committee were very much at sea and gave a great deal of time to the matter. The committee sent for a great many people to get their ideas and opinions. We were confronted with men who wanted this product out and that product in. There was a large sentiment in the committee and in the consideration of the preparation of the bill it was unanimously agreed, I believe, to eliminate all of the base products except wheat and cotton. When we come to put them in it is a very difficult thing to say what shall be put in and what shall be left out. Sometimes we have to be more or less arbitrary. We have things included that I should rather have seen left out, but the committee thought otherwise.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Frankly my inquiry was directed to discover whether there is any objection here to the inclusion of additional commodities through amendments which may be proposed on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. In reply to that it seemed to be the opinion of the administration that there should be as few as possible representing the staple agricultural products.

Mr. KING, Mr. OVERTON, and Mr. FESS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH. I will yield in just a moment.

It was frankly admitted, as will be seen by the message of the President, that this is purely experimental and if in any particular or as a whole the bill should not, in its practical application, begin to evidence that it is going to result in what is hoped for, its operation will be immediately discontinued.

I yield now to the Senator from Utah, who rose first.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think in view of the statement made by the President—and I think that it showed a great deal of perspicacity on his part and showed that he doubted perhaps the wisdom of this sort of legislation—that it would be better when administering experimental medicines to a sick patient to limit the number of medicines administered and experiment with 1 or 2 medicines first, and if they are not effective, or if they fail to cure the patient, then try other medicines?

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Nebraska practically answered that question. The present committee by a majority vote refused to act as the previous committee had acted in restricting the number of commodities to two, namely, wheat and cotton. In reply to the Senator, I think it very obvious that if we are to try an experiment which may be disastrously costly—nobody can tell—it would be better to minimize the losses rather than to extend it to the point where the losses might be considerable, and if the desired benefits were realized as to the two commodities we could add others from time to time as occasion might require. That, however, is water over the wheel. I want to say that we tried that, and we could not do it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him on that particular question?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator's committee finally decided on seven basic articles?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In connection with that I should like to have the Senator explain subsection (3), which he is now discussing. This proposed law will operate only through processors. Subsection (3) is all-inclusive. It grants the power to issue licenses——

Mr. SMITH. I am coming to that.

Mr. FESS. My question is precisely on the subject the Senator has been discussing. It grants the power—to issue licenses permitting processors, associations of producers, and others to engage in the handling, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, of any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof, or any competing commodity or product thereof.

Is any competing commodity left out?

Mr. SMITH. I admit that this entire bill is, in my opinion, very carelessly drawn if it be designed to bring about exactly what its framers desired, but where the word "any" is used——

Mr. FESS. The language is "any competing commodity."

Mr. SMITH. Where that word is used in the provision for the issue of licenses, permitting processors and other associations to engage in handling, and so forth, the Senator will find in line 18 that it is used in the phrase "of any basic commodity." That obviously refers to any one of the basic commodities included in the bill.

Mr. FESS. Can it limit if we say "any competing commodity"? Will not that include all food commodities?

Mr. SMITH. In view of the enumeration of the commodities in the bill I think that refers to those commodities.

Mr. FESS. I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like the attention of the Senator from Ohio. I do not agree with the chairman of the committee that the bill is carelessly drawn. I never knew of an instance where a committee spent more time on a bill, with all its members present and staying there all day, early and late, trying honestly to settle and to harmonize various ideas, than I observed in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SMITH. I think that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. There was no politics; there was no selfishness in it. Everybody, it seemed to me, was 100 percent trying to do something for agriculture.

Now, coming to the question of the Senator from Ohio, I can see the point he makes. In another portion of the bill the right is given to the Secretary of Agriculture to levy a process tax on a competing commodity. At first blush it is difficult to see why that power should be given. It is a safeguard; it is only for the purpose of correcting what the Secretary may find has been a mistake in the amount of the processing tax. If he finds that he has levied a processing tax that has raised the price of the product to such an extent that competing or substitute products, no matter whether they be agricultural products or what they are, are being used instead, and that instead of helping the consumption of the agricultural product it is desired to help its use is diminishing by reason of the amount of the processing tax, the Secretary can lower that tax or he can levy a tax—and this is where I am coming to the Senator's question, which I think was a very proper one—on the competing article, no matter what it may be.

Mr. FESS. So that, under circumstances such as those stated by the Senator from Nebraska, the power is broad enough to cover it?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is broad enough.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator where he finds the power in the Constitution or any other place to prevent consumers from utilizing a competitive commodity. For instance, there are seven commodities embraced in this bill; but supposing the Senator from Ohio, by his genius and his chemical knowledge, should invent some article which might possibly come into competition with some of the commodities mentioned in this bill, an article which had food value, which was good for the body but which someone might technically hold was competitive with one of the commodities covered by the bill. Then, as I understand this bill, the Secretary of Agriculture, by blanket authority, could bring that commodity within the operations of the bill and could impose a tax upon it, though it is not specifically mentioned in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I plead with the lawyers of the Senate not to enter into a constitutional discussion on this bill until I am through? [Laughter.] Then the floodgates may be opened. I should like first, however, to conclude as to the layman's idea of what his duty is in reference to this bill.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. Have the basic commodities covered by the bill an exportable surplus, and did that question enter into the determination of whether commodities would be included or excluded from the bill?

Mr. SMITH. I did not catch the purport of the question.

Mr. OVERTON. The purport of the question is this. As I recall, when the domestic-allotment plan was up for discussion last year it was defeated largely upon the theory that commodities would be included that had not an exportable surplus.

Mr. SMITH. That did not enter into the consideration of this bill, except incidentally.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senator from South Carolina, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that all commodities included in the bill except dairy products have an exportable surplus.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, just a short explanation: Under title II, paragraph 2, the Secretary of Agriculture is given the power to enter into contracts with processors under such terms, and so forth, as he may be able to make, and I think the text of the bill indicates that such agreements are to be given full force and effect of law. In case there cannot be an agreement entered into under paragraph 2, title II, the Secretary of Agriculture is then given the power to license the processors and bring them under his jurisdiction by the terms of the license, the power being reposed in him to revoke such licenses when, in his opinion, their terms have not been complied with, and to fix a penalty against those who may violate the terms of such licenses.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. One of the features of the bill that bothers me is, if I understand its purport, that no processor, after the bill shall have passed, will be able to continue in business without having a Federal license.

Mr. SMITH. Or an agreement.

Mr. FESS. Can an agreement take the place of a license?

Mr. SMITH. There is the alternative.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio repeat his question so that it may be understood over here?

Mr. FESS. My question was whether after the passage of the bill a processor could continue in business without having a Federal license?

Mr. SMITH. He can continue in business without a license or he can operate if he conforms to paragraph 2, which allows him to enter into a marketing agreement. It was impressed upon the committee as one of the necessary provisions of the bill that the Secretary of Agriculture might make such agreements with the processors as not to require a license at all, and that, once the two had agreed, such agreement should have the force and effect of law, and a license would not be required.

Mr. FESS. The weakness of that, Mr. President, would be that there is no penalty attached at all for a violation of the agreement.

Mr. SMITH. I assume that the penalty would be that an immediate license would be required, and under the license a penalty could be attached.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, so that I may understand the full significance of the Senator's reply, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the bill mean that, for instance, a man who is running a little gristmill in some remote portion of the United States, who buys wheat from the farmer, grinds it into flour, bran, and shorts, would have to obtain a license in order to operate his mill?

Mr. SMITH. If he did not enter into an agreement beforehand he would, provided he was carrying on the business for commercial purposes.

Mr. KING. One would be operating a mill only for commercial purposes.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. As the Senator knows, in many sections of the country women, and men, too, for that matter, take fruit during the fruit season and can a limited amount in their own kitchens or in their own homes, put it upon the market, and dispose of it; and in some places it has a limited market because of its superior quality. I suppose the woman who thus takes the fruit and manufactures it into a commodity for sale in a limited area would have to obtain a license.

Mr. SMITH. There is a modification in the bill which I will come to covering that matter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have not before my eyes at this moment the text covering the point, but I do not think it is necessary to have it. The power given the Secretary of Agriculture is discretionary and not directory. He does not necessarily have to issue a license to anyone dealing as a processor in any of the agricultural commodities mentioned in the bill; but, in order to prevent unfair practices by someone who is discriminating in the conduct of his business, the Secretary may require him to take out a license, and if he continues to violate it, then he is subject to a fine.

Mr. KING. Then the power is lodged in the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McNARY. Unquestionably the discretionary power is lodged in him, but the Senator from Utah seemed to proceed upon the assumption that the power was compelled to be exercised by the Secretary in the case of all who were engaged in the processing of the articles mentioned in the bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator has been in public life long enough and he is statesman enough to know that discretionary power once vested in bureaus and Federal officials, and, for that matter, in State officials, is seldom used leniently, but too often is used arbitrarily.

Mr. SMITH. In reply to the question the Senator from Utah propounded as to the housewife and others processing, on page 19, line 15, subdivision (b), the bill reads as follows:

> The Secretary of Agriculture may provide by regulation for exemption from the tax of commodities processed by the producer thereof or processed for the producer.

That means, of course, that where corn is ground into grits for the use of the farmer by one who is running a gristmill it may be exempted, and the limitation is also lifted. It was limited in the original bill, but the Senate committee proposed this amendment.

Now, I want to come back to the marketing agreement and the license feature.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. McNARY. Has the Senator discussed section 8 and the power there conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture with respect to the employment of a so-called "allotment plan", and the retirement of excess acreage through rental benefits?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I have gone over that.
